CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

their inn till 8 o'clock, hoping that assistance would come from us; then, despairing of that hope, they left their inn and were surprised to find the town so quiet.

The sigh of relief they gave on reaching the town gate was turned into a gasp of dismay as they passed through and found a mob of several thousand people waiting for them outside. A band of 200 men lining the road waited till the last cart had passed out of the town and then made a sudden attack on our friends, who jumped off the carts and tried to frighten them off by firing a few revolver shots over their heads. Mrs. Leslie, who was completely prostrated by the fatigue of the journey, was unable to get off her cart, and it was in trying to shield her that Dr. Leslie was seriously injured. Besides a large number of flesh wounds he had his right wrist and right leg cut through to the bone, the large sinews in each case being severed. Mr. Goforth also received bad sword cuts on the head, and two of Mr. Jameson's men who fought bravely received severe wounds, which later proved to be fatal. When our friends got clear of the carts, the mob began at once to break open the boxes and the sight of the loot turned the armed band from their design, thus enabling our friends to make good their escape.

In the course of the day they all found their way back to the main road, managed to get the empty carts, and proceeded on their journey, having lost everything, but thankful to have escaped alive. At daybreak next morning the servant who had lost his way rejoined us. He belonged to Mr. Goforth, so we gave him a shoe of silver and sent him back to meet his party.

We pushed on toward Fan Ch'êng and about midday reached the border of Hupei province to find a fine body of soldiers sent out to meet us from Hsiang Yang Fu, by order of Chang Chih Tung. Our hearts went up in thanksgiving as we realized that here was real and adequate help, and that consequently our dangers were over. Arriving at Fan Ch'êng we found that every provision had been made for our safety and comfort. We waited here for our friends, who arrived on the night of the 10th, in a sad plight indeed, poor Dr. Leslie especially being in a bad case, having had to lie in the bottom of his cart for three days without having his wounds attended to since they had received the first rough dressing by Dr. Jennie Dow, who tore up one of her remaining garments to make bandages for him.

We spent all of the next day providing them with an outfit. Mr. Jameson and his friends were able to supply the gentlemen with underclothing, etc., while the ladies had to be content with a Chinese wardrobe. Our sweet little Eleanore died on the 11th, just 9 months old, and while our hearts felt too sore for words, we were so thankful that she had lived until reaching Fan Ch'êng, as we were able to take the body on from there and have it buried in the English cemetery at Hankow.

We traveled down the Han River to that port, and two days out from there were met by a steam launch sent out by the American consul to bring us in.

Arriving at Hankow on the 21st we went directly on board a steamer for Shanghai, having been twenty-four days on our journey.

ENGLISH BAPTIST MISSION, SHANSI.

Upon the entrance of Yü Hsien into Shansi as governor, the Boxers spread rapidly throughout the province.

Communication with the coast was cut off in May, so that money supplies were not received. About June 21 Mr. Farthing wrote from T'ai Yuan Fu to Mr. Dixon, at Hsin Chou, that it was known that a telegram had come from the Empress Dowager to destroy all foreigners, and added "If true, I am ready and do not fear; if such be God's will I can even rejoice to die." On reading this, Mr. Dixon said to Mr. Chao, his evangelist, "I feel just the same!"

In the city of Hsin Chou, from June 23–25, near the mission premises, theatrical performances were given to the god of wealth. A great crowd were present and a clamoring mob formed at the mission gate. Appeal was made to the magistrate who at first promised a guard, but it failed to appear.

By this time the edict telegraphed from Pekin had become known, as when another request was made, with threat of reporting to the governor if not granted, the magistrate replied, "Tell the foreigner he can report to the Emperor if he likes and I shall not fear!"

Reports from country stations of violence of Boxers toward native Christians led to sending a messenger to T'ai Yuan with a letter of consultation to Mr. Farthing. On reaching T'ai Yuan the messenger found some of the missions already destroyed and all abandoned. He hastened back and reported the circumstances. Mr. Dixon comprehended the growing danger, called the mission together, and after consultation decided upon flight. There were eight in their party.

Taking food, clothing, and bedding, with some money, they set out in the early morning and traveled 30 li, where they rested for a time. While at this point they learned that two hours after they left their homes a proclamation from the governor had come for the local officials to destroy the foreigners' houses and kill the foreigners. On hearing this they decided to move on at once to the place of hiding which they had chosen.

After leaving the village, Mr. Dixon dismissed the faithful evangelist, Mr. Chao, who was only pursuaded to leave them on the consideration that he might get word to foreign friends and perhaps secure help. It was a sorrowful parting, but in it shone forth the brave spirit of those who were soon to lay down their lives. Mr. Dixon said, "If we are all killed and not one escapes, there are many more to take our place." Mrs. Dixon spoke of her four children who were to lose a mother's care, but said, "God will surely raise up friends for them."

This same evangelist returned to Shansi in October and learned the rest of the story of this company.

On the evening of that day they reached the village of Liu Chia Shan, where the one Christian of the place had his home in a cave, and where they expected to prepare a cave for themselves as a place of refuge and defense.

They lived in this place for twenty days unmolested, when their place of hiding became known to the Boxers, who sent a company to arrest them. The villagers fled and the band could not effect their arrest. A few days later a deputy with soldiers went to them and with promises of a safe escort to the coast induced them to return to Hsin Chou. By this time their food supply was exhausted, and they had been five days without food.

On arriving at Hsin Chou they were taken to the yamen. The magistrate asked how much money they had in the bank, and when told drew it all out and kept it himself.

The missionaries were placed in the common jail, where they were kept for sixteen days, receiving only the poorest prison fare. On August 7 a deputy from Yü Hsien came to see that the governor's will was carried out.

Two days later they were taken from prison, placed in four carts, and told they were to be taken to the coast. Arriving at the east gate of the city the missionaries were dragged from their carts and stripped of all their clothes. Then both Boxers and soldiers set upon them and literally hacked their heads to pieces. Their bodies were dragged outside the city and left on the banks of a river where they were shamefully treated by villagers near by. Later the head of the literary graduates of the city, who had been friendly to Mr. Dixon, brought mats in which to wrap the bodies and hired men to bury them at the foot of the city wall.

After the massacre the highest military official went to the mission houses, chose the articles which he wanted for himself, and then turned the houses over to the soldiers and the people to loot.

CHINA INLAND MISSION, HONAN.[a]

The long-continued drought in Honan had produced a restless feeling among the people and made them ripe for mobs and riots. Warning had been sent by missionaries fleeing from the north that it would be better for us at Shê Ch'i Tien to escape at once.

Sunday, July 8, a large crowd gathered at the close of the service, watching the Christians as they scattered, and although it was dispersed without an outbreak it became evident that we must hasten our preparations for leaving.

The next morning at an early hour the streets were again packed with a mob, evidently intent on mischief. We could not go into the streets, but our boxes were taken over a wall into a neighbor's yard, and we all followed by means of a ladder. Soon after this the mob were battering on our front door. Our teacher, who was pale with apprehension, said: "I fear worse than death may happen to you." The landlord of that house led us to his guest hall, in one corner of which was a ladder leading to a loft. He bade us "Go up quickly and keep still."

There we lay hid, listening to the shouts of the mob and soon to the crash of falling timbers and masonry. The rioting had begun in earnest. The heat was intense, and in a little time we heard the crackling of flames and saw the smoke of our burning homes. Suddenly there was a rush. The mob had traced us over the wall and into the room beneath, where every sound was heard by us. "Kill the foreigners! They must be here! Let us go up the ladder!"

After brisk altercation they were dissuaded from doing so and went away, only to return again and again. They got on the roof and stared in through the five windows, but we stood between the windows, flat against the wall. Once two boys caught sight of us and spread the news. Back came the crowd, but again were bluffed off by the landlord.

So passed the day from 7 a. m. till 8 p. m., when darkness brought relief. One of the ladies had been seriously ill and was very weak. Her month-old babe might cry and reveal our whereabouts, when all would be lost. We prayed in silence, and the Lord heard and kept the child quiet from dawn till dark. A pot of tea was passed up, and then the wearied mother could quench her thirst.

Then the landlord came and said: "Don't delay; follow me." We descended the ladder, crossed the court, and entered a room where grain was stored. A stool was placed on a great basket of grain. From this we clambered through a trapdoor to a loft above. The stool was removed, the door shut, and all trace of our whereabouts was gone. The room was full of dust and rubbish, but it gave us a safe refuge for four long days.

That first night we left the loft to go to another house where carts were to take us away, when the police again appeared at the front gate to search the house. Back we hastened up the ladder, and their search was again futile. The next morning rioters came and finished the work of demolishing our house. All day their yells and blows on the house sounded in our ears. Toward night I heard two men piling timbers near our hiding place to burn us out, but they did not fire the house.

Every night new plans for escape were discussed. Every day fresh bands of searchers came to hunt for us. At midday of Thursday our landlord suddenly appeared and said, "Fly! they have come with swords to kill you." In two minutes all had dropped through the trapdoor and scaled the wall into the garden of our ruined home and were standing in the blazing sun. Soon a man followed us over the wall, failed to see us, and called back, "They are not here." We were soon safely back in our loft again.

That night came rain and with it a chance to escape to a large business firm, where we were hidden in the strong room in the top of the house. The room was small and dark, with one window 18 inches high. Here we stayed twelve days, guarded by a member of the firm who was armed with gun and sword and sharp, heavy iron pins for throwing.

In the early morning of our last day carts were brought, in which we made our way out of the city and 8 li down the river, where a small boat was in waiting with four men for escort. The boat was searched by customs officials at different barriers twelve times or more, but we were not discovered.

We and our escort lived in the one small cabin thirteen days until we reached Hankow in safety. We paid our escort their well-earned reward and dismissed them. We were ragged and dirty and in clothing that we had lived in for a month, but we were thankful to have been brought safely through our perils by One who "never forsakes those who trust in Him."

CHINA INLAND MISSION, SHANSI.*

Mr. and Mrs. Ogren had been stationed at Yung Ning in the western part of Shansi only a year. The officials were very friendly, one of them having asked Mr. Ogren privately the right way to pray for rain, as his own prayer had been unavailing. The people had become restless and threatening because of the long drought.

In the middle of June the Boxers came to the city. They rapidly made recruits, and soon a guard was sent to protect the mission from them. The official advised Mr. Ogren to take his family away. Their servants began to forsake them.

One day a man went through the streets beating a gong and warning the people away from the wells which the foreigners had poisoned. That day the main spring of the city turned red. The official dared not let Mr. Ogren longer visit him, but sent his secretary by night to consult with them. They at last asked the official to furnish them with funds for their journey, their own supply from the coast being cut off. This he was ready to do; also to take charge of their house.

That night, while packing, a spy was discovered in a tree of the court watching them. Before daylight the morning of July 13 Mr. and Mrs. Ogren and their little child started in a litter for the Yellow River, 80 li away, to go to Hankow. They were provided with a guard and also with an order from the magistrate to the official at the river bank to hire a boat for them. On arriving at the river there was a hostile demonstration by the crowd, but the official saw them safely off in person. Two soldiers went with them on the boat.

The current was very swift, and their frail craft was in constant danger of being wrecked. They went 500 li, halfway to Tung Kuan, the corner of the province where Shansi, Shensi, and Hanan join. At this halfway place they were told that a party of foreigners had been murdered and their bodies thrown into the river only a few days before, and it was probable that this would be their fate if they continued down the river.

They decided to get across the river into Shensi, and soon came to a place where there was an official 80 years old, who knew the Yung Ning official and showed them great kindness. He had a farm across the river in Shansi and offered to send them there and let them have food, while they could hide in caves near by till peace came. While with this old official, a party of soldiers came, saying they were sent to drive the foreigners out of the province. Their host gave the soldiers a feast and persuaded them to go away. He soon sent the refugees on their way, with servants to escort them across the river.

It was only 10 li distant, but before going half that distance they were set upon by robbers, who took all their money, except 100 cash, and most of their clothing. Reaching the ferry, they crossed in the early morning, but waited four days to send back to the old official for money. This came, and they walked on toward the farm, going slowly, carrying their child. The next day they reached the farm, but were not kindly received by the tenants. At first they refused them food, but later gave a scanty supply. They were twice visited by robbers, and at last were threatened by the farmer's son, who coveted the 100 taels offered by Yü Hsien for every foreigner's head.

This led them to leave their hiding place and make their way northward again to return to Yung Ning. The road was very rough, the country sparsely inhabited, but many people were kind, so they could at least get one meal a day and places to sleep.

After several days they came to a branch of the Yellow River, which they must ford on foot. An old man led the way through the swift current and also let them rest at his place that night and the next day. The day after, when nearing a customs barrier, they were set upon by a crowd and later followed by a customs guard, who had been ordered to get them out of Shensi. This guard several times seemed on the point of killing them, but finally went with them across the river and then handed them over to the Boxers.

The next morning Mr. Ogren was taken to the Boxer general. Mrs. Ogren could hear his voice for a time pleading for his life, then the sound of the incantations inquiring if their lives were to be spared, then followed a great uproar, which she thought to be his death.

Later a man came to take her on, telling her she and her husband were to be sent on to Yung Ning, but she did not believe that the latter was still living. She spent that night in a cave. In the morning, while going on, they met a Boxer band and her guide disappeared. The Boxers rushed at her as if about to kill her, but only ordered her to get away, which she did rapidly.

In the afternoon she stopped under the shade of a tree, where many women gathered around her. They were very kind and pitiful and gave food for herself and babe. At night she learned that there were Christians across the river. She forded it, being nearly swept away, and then found no friends, only enemies who would only give her water, and left her and the child to sleep under the open sky. In the night two Christians stole to her side and led her to a cave, but could do no more for her because of the Boxers.

In the morning she recrossed the river, but was soon seen by Boxers, who, with drawn swords, drove her to a temple. The headman of the village came out and rescued her, giving her food and some stockings; the next day he sent her on to Ta Ning under guard. The Boxers followed, full of fury, and were with difficulty restrained from falling upon her. Arriving at Ta Ning she was taken to the common prison. Food and fruit and some money were passed to her through a hole in the door. The keepers were quite kind.

The next morning she was taken to the magistrate, and made to kneel while she told her story. He became kindly in manner, and said her husband was still living and would rejoin her later. She was then led to an inner court, where the official's wife wanted to see her. The lady came out on a balcony and threw 100 cash to her. That night in the midst of the night she heard her husband's voice calling her. She found him speaking through a hole in the door. The next morning they were taken to a comfortable room in the yamen, where she was able to dress his wounds, cook some food for him, and hear the story of his escape.

When taken to the Boxer general he had first been upbraided for destroying the people with his doctrine, and was then given up to the crowd of Boxers. They kicked and beat him cruelly, taunting him with "Pray to your Jesus now!"

They led him to the bank of the river to kill him, and there fell on him with spears and swords. Being clumsy with their weapons they inflicted no fatal wounds. He finally jumped into the river, and although his hands were bound he struggled across and escaped in the darkness. The next day a Christian farmer helped him with food and money. Learning that his wife was at Ta Ning he worked his way on to that city, avoiding notice and evading Boxers until just as he entered the city, when he was chased to the yamen, where the official sheltered him. His wounds were severe, on head and neck and shoulders, from sword and spear.

By this time it was the last of August. After two days two donkeys with wooden pack saddles were furnished them, and they were sent on to P'u Hsien. They were attacked by Boxers, but their guard fought them off. From that place they were to have gone on to P'ing Yang, but orders came to send them back to Ta Ning.

This journey was made in great pain and discomfort, no food being given them. Her husband fell into the water when fording a stream, but they at last reached the city. They were again put in prison and given food. At this time the little one grew very ill, but a man brought a cow and they got milk. The vermin in the filthy prison were terrible, and Mr. Ogren grew ill with fever. Their only comfort was prayer.

Here they lived on till early in October, when deliverance came.

*Story of Mr. and Mrs. Ogren.

Orders arrived to suppress the Boxers and send the foreigners to P'ing Yang to be forwarded to the coast. They went part of the way in chairs and part way in mule litters, being forwarded from stage to stage by the officials.

Arriving at P'ing Yang they were most politely received by the officials and sent to a former mission house. It was nearly all in ruins but there were two rooms that could be used. After a few days Mr. Ogren grew worse and died October 15. The Chinese were kind and assisted in giving burial. Not a few surviving Christians came to sympathize with his widow.

Soon after the baby boy grew very ill, but again the mother got a cow and with proper food the child recovered. The latter part of October she was joined by Mr. McKie, Miss Chapman, and Miss Way, who, with herself, were probably the only foreigners who had remained in the province and survived the storm. Early in December a little daughter was born to her, and a month later the party were sent under escort south through Shansi, Honan, and Hupei to Hankow, which they reached after about six weeks of travel.

KALGAN TO KIAKHTA.*

On June 6, 1900, the Rev. Mark Williams and the Rev. J. H. Roberts left Pekin for Kalgan, returning to that station in haste to help the Rev. W. P. Sprague and other members of the mission of the American board against the Boxers. With us went Miss Dr. V. C. Murdock, to do medical work in Kalgan, and Mr. Carl G. Söderborn, whose family were there. Passing through Hsüan Hua Fu we persuaded Mr. Lundquist and family to go with us, for there were many Boxers in that city.

On June 10 we reached Kalgan, and found a howling mob at our gate—hundreds of men and boys having come to see our houses burned. After a long time an official sent the mob away, but they returned in the evening, and the danger became so imminent that a shotgun had to be pointed at the crowd. Most providentially they yielded to that argument.

In the night we sent away all the Chinese who were with us, and at daybreak we fled to the yamen of the Manchu general. There were six in our party, including Mrs. Sprague and Miss Engh. We asked to be protected one day and sent into Mongolia with a guard. In the afternoon a mob gathered in front of the yamen. The general tried to send us to another part of the city, but we refused to go. At sunset we and our baggage were removed to a little musty house in one corner of the yard and were locked up—whether for life or death we did not know—but after midnight we were sent with a guard of many soldiers through the Great Wall into Mongolia.

We found that the Mongols also were Boxers, and there was no place where we could remain. At Hara Oso, 50 miles northwest of Kalgan, we joined Messrs. Larson, Söderborn, and Lundquist, with their families, who were living in tents, and preparing to go to Urga. Mr. Sprague went back to Kalgan and got our money, which was on deposit in a Chinese bank. He brought with him Mr. A. L. Fagerholm, who was vainly trying to reach the coast. Mr. Roberts also went to Kalgan, to get warm clothing for the whole party. We all rejoiced that, when we had to flee for our lives, we found ten camels and nine horses ready for our use.

On June 23, under a glorious sunset sky, we started on our long journey. The third day we lost a camel, and the search for it delayed us two days. Meantime messengers came from four Swedish missionaries, who had been attacked by a mob in Fêng Chên and were hurrying to overtake us. Their magistrate, most wonderful to relate, had given them an indemnity of 800 taels ($600), and they came to us with large supplies of money and food. The latter was as necessary to us as our camels and horses were to them, and we saw that the loss of the camel was most providential, as without it they could not have overtaken us.

Our party consisted of 10 men, 7 ladies, 6 little children, and 7 Mongols to care for the animals. At the most we had 20 camels and 19 horses. At one place we were forbidden to draw water from the well. The King of the Sunit Mongols forbade his people to sell animals to us, and sent soldiers to watch the wells, lest we put poison in them.

Mr. Larson was a splendid leader, a good marksman and horseman, a fluent speaker of Mongolian, and a man of great courage. He had traversed the desert of Gobi twice before. We called him "Moses." We had an armament of 1 rifle, 1 shotgun, and 2 revolvers, which, under the divine Providence, saved us from attack.

Two ladies and two gentlemen each day formed a cooking committee. The other men were a fuel committee, the fuel consisting of the dung of animals, dried in the sun and wind. Two large buckets with covers, carried on a camel, contained our precious supply of water. The wells were far apart, and often the water was undrinkable. Once in a few days we killed a sheep and ate mutton, but the meat was little for so many hungry people. Our chief food was thin rice or millet gruel, with gravel in it that cracked our teeth. Once in five or ten days one would feel satisfied with his dinner.

In the desert ten days of great heat intensified our thirst. The shade of the six carts, in which the ladies and children rode and slept, was our only relief from the burning sun; and the lack of sleep, due to constant traveling in the night, made existence almost unendurable.

When within 120 miles of Urga, we telegraphed to the Russian consul-general: "Six Americans, seventeen Swedes, going to Urga request protection." His answer, telling us to come right to the consulate, gave us a new lease of life. Arriving there July 30, after thirty-eight days (660 miles) from Hara Oso, we had four days of rest.

However, Urga was full of Boxers, and we must move on. Russian passports were given us, to enable us to travel to St. Petersburg; food was bought for our journey; and we started for Kiakhta, the nearest town in Siberia. Mr. O. S. Nästegard, jr., a Norwegian missionary, who could speak Russian, went with us and became our "Joshua."

Shortly after leaving Urga we met 350 Cossacks, who had been sent to protect us. In thirteen days we traveled 210 miles to the border of the two Empires. There the Mongol mandarin tried to stop us, but the Russian governor of Kiakhta saved us from his clutches. We rested there two weeks. Many Russians were very kind to us. The infant child of Mr. Söderborn died, and was buried in a Russian cemetery, and even the priest attended our Protestant funeral. Money was sent by cable from America for our use, but the robbers, who dogged our steps fourteen days, could not get it, because we took it in letters of credit, to be paid in Irkutsk.

We hired a number of tarantasses—carriages with wooden springs, drawn by three horses, driven furiously—and after going five days over prairie and mountains, and through a magnificent forest, we reached Lake Baikal, which we crossed on a small steamer September 1. The waves on the lake were tremendous. Recovering from seasickness, we spent the night sleeping on a railroad station platform. The next morning we reached Irkutsk. Then ten days on the Siberian Railway brought us to Moscow. A Government permit granted us a special car, new, clean, and commodious. We left our Swedish companions in St. Petersburg, and came via Berlin and London to New York, where we arrived November 8, after traveling more than four months.

It was a special providence that we were driven out of China in the summer, for, exposed as we were to the weather day and night on the table-land of Mongolia and in the high latitudes of Siberia, we should have suffered terribly from the cold at any other season. A Russian friend, on hearing about our journey, said: "Your guardian angels have come with you all the way." Not only during our flight, but also afterwards, as we have learned of the many deaths of missionaries in China, we have realized that God himself was leading us and fulfilling His gracious promise: "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest."

The Rev. J. W. Stevenson, director of the China Inland Mission, compiled the following list of the Protestant missionaries who were killed, or who died from injuries received during the Boxer uprising of 1899 and 1900, the societies with which they were connected, the provinces in which they were located, and their nationality:

XXXIV.—CATASTROPHE TO THE NATIVE CHURCH.

The number of Protestant Christians in China at the beginning of the Boxer movement, by which is meant actual members of churches, was estimated to be somewhat more than one hundred thousand. To this should be added three or four times as many more who came under the general name of adherents, denoting those who, while not yet baptized, were either members of families where the leading elements were Christian or were themselves favorably disposed to the new faith. It is from this class that converts are perpetually recruited. The membership of the Roman Catholics, usually reckoned by families, was several times as numerous, that faith having been in China for many centuries. In each case these Christians were distributed over a large part of the Empire, the number of Protestants in Manchuria being much larger than elsewhere.

While there are among these communities some who are wealthy, or rather in a small way well-to-do, by far the larger number of them come from the farming and the working classes. In China, as in the land of its birth, it has always been true that "to the poor the gospel is preached," and considering the hopes which this faith enkindles and the barrenness of the average Chinese life, this is not singular.

It is a capital error to suppose that there are in the Chinese churches any considerable number of those who join them from unworthy motives, for what they can get. Of the Protestant churches at least we can speak upon this point from full knowledge. The Chinese are excellent judges of character, and in such a condensed society it is impossible that the main facts with regard to every applicant should not be well and accurately known. Numerous mistakes of judgment must, of course, be made, but missionaries and natives alike have learned by long experience that eternal vigilance is the price of a church which will not fall apart of its own weight, and the tendency accordingly is continually toward a raising of the standard.

It should be remembered that there are always and everywhere serious risks attending the identification of anyone with a body like that of the Christian church in China, and in the face of the inevitable ostracism the advantages are too precarious to be attractive. Those who had joined the Christians from unworthy motives hastened in this last year to cut loose as soon as the dangers of their connection became apparent.

It is important also to bear in mind the fact that in a society like that of China it is inevitable that every Christian should have many enemies. It is a classical saying that on entering a village one should inquire its customs. In China the first and greatest commandment is not to do what others do not do also, for thus only will the whole of the Chinese law and the prophets be fulfilled. But the Chinese Christian is ex officio a nonconformist. He objects to ancestral worship, which is the real religion of the Chinese race. He refuses to subscribe to the erection of temples, to the performance of Taoist and Buddhist ceremonies, and to the village theatricals held in honor of some god or goddess.

He is at variance with his family and with his clan on occasion of every wedding and every funeral, and weddings and funerals constitute a large part of the earthly joys of the barren life of the Chinese. In the incessant and intricate relations with innumerable individuals he will have differences on a great variety of subjects with a great variety of people, and whether he is himself at fault or not, he will have earned the ill-will of many persons. And the Chinese have long memories for grudges and spites, which are not infrequently carried on from generation to generation, each one patiently waiting until his turn shall have come for that revenge so dear to the Chinese, and so strongly inculcated in the classics.

All persecutions of Christians in China have within them these inevitable elements, but this special one differed from all that had gone before. Those were local and sporadic, often secretly stimulated by the literati, and not infrequently by officials. This one was an emanation direct from the Throne itself. Never had there been such an opportunity as was now afforded to pay off old scores with compound interest.

The social solidarity of China is such that all the parts are more distinctly and exactly representative of the whole than perhaps in any other society in the world. When it is remembered that the Chinese are deeply imbued with a profound respect for all the forms of authority, one gains a faint notion of what an official and especially an Imperial persecution must be in China, far exceeding in its inherent momentum those of ancient Rome. The Chinese mind does not readily entertain the conception of actual resistance to regularly appointed magistrates. Every Chinese is unconsciously something of a fatalist, and when he is commanded by the highest power of which he knows anything to do or to forbear doing certain acts, he naturally regards it as "the will of heaven," and bends to the storm. That all Chinese did not behave thus in this universal persecution is itself a phenomenon to be accounted for, and one which shows that some force absolutely new in Chinese history had taken possession of many of the Chinese race.

The officials, some through motives of the deepest hostility to Christianity, and some with a desire to save the lives of their subjects, issued orders to the Christians to recant, sometimes furnishing tickets which should be pasted over their doors, certifying that they were no longer members of "the foreign religion" and were thus entitled to protection. This plan was in accordance with an imperial edict, and it is not to be wondered at that many Christians fell into the cunning trap laid for them, especially when, as in Shantung, it was accompanied by the alluring words "temporarily recant." In Manchuria some of the magistrates hit upon the happy plan of requiring the converts merely to step over the figure of a cross drawn upon the ground, which many of them hastened to do, glad to have escaped with no worse test, by no means realizing the significance of what they had done.

In one marked instance in Shantung two native pastors under great pressure took upon themselves the responsibility and the sin of vicariously recanting on behalf of their whole flock in order to save their lives. They had not the smallest intention of denying the faith, but nothing else was to be done, they thought, and it was better that two men should incur guilt than that the whole church should do so.

The innumerable varieties of recantation, actual and merely nominal, make the problem of the rehabilitation of the church in the regions where it prevailed a delicate and a serious one. But it should be distinctly recognized that in all but a fraction of cases it was regarded as only a form, an error no doubt due in many cases to inadequate instruction on the part of their leaders. Innumerable instances of absolute refusal to deny the faith under any circumstances, especially among the large Roman Catholic communities, are everywhere reported, but the case is not fully set forth without the distinct avowal that this was by no means the universal rule.

In some regions the threats of the Boxers had been heard for many, many weary months, or perhaps for more than a year. The poor Christian communities had been living the lives of isolated sheep, with a day perpetually threatened for the advent of the wolves in force. Is it any wonder that at the last many of them fainted with terror at the actuality so long menacing them, and did whatever seemed to be required to prevent their aged parents from being turned adrift with no home and no food?

Some groups of Christians were pillaged over and over again, while elsewhere there was nothing but rapine and sudden death, the whole storm having passed over in an afternoon, leaving scarcely a living representative of the hated faith. "Destroy Christians root and branch" was often the war cry, which the Boxers sought to carry into literal effect by killing not only all human beings, but every cat, dog, and chicken belonging to the homes of Christians, cutting down every tree, uprooting flowers, and laying waste the courts and gardens of the ruined houses. In a room occupied by a refugee Christian family a forlorn little kitten was pointed out to a lady visitor, with the remark: "A whole village was out all night hunting for that cat. They said that it must be found and destroyed or it would bring calamity to the town. It was picked up and sent to relatives at a distance, and so escaped."

Never was the prophecy that the foes of a man shall be they of his own house more exactly fulfilled. They were themselves the spies and informants, whose precise knowledge nothing could escape. All human affection, all social sympathies seemed to be dried up at the roots. Daughters drove away their own mothers from their doors, saying, "Don't you come in here, or we shall be implicated too; go to your foreign friends; let them look after you." Even the storage of books, or clothing, or any article of furniture was absolutely forbidden under penalty of having the house pulled down or burned. The nearest neighbors were often the ones who invited the Boxers to come, leading them through the village and pointing out every door to Christian courts. Then when the goods were dragged upon the streets and sold for next to nothing, these were the ones who bought them for a trifle, subsequently reviling and taunting the owners, when they crept back to their desolated yards, with the observation that there was no more place for them—their goods were distributed to new owners, and their land had reverted to the village temples.

The cruelties of the persecutors found expression in the most hideous forms. All the barbarities practiced upon foreigners were shared likewise by their followers. Men, women, and children were chopped into pieces and their bodies thrown into running streams to be dispersed beyond power of doing injury. Great numbers were burned alive, and children were flung back into the flames after they had once broken forth. Yet in one case known to the writer a lad who had twice been bound and thrown into the Grand Canal, and had each time succeeded in getting free, was allowed to escape, because it must be "the will of heaven." Unusually attractive Christian children were sometimes adopted by the Boxers or by others, valuable lives being thus saved. Many Christian maidens were sold to a life of odious slavery to be the "wives" of the Boxers who had killed all the other members of their families.

The mutilation of Christians may be said in some regions to have been the rule, not the exception, generally followed by a slow and terrible death. In other cases the joints of the victims were dislocated, and they were left in this maimed condition.

The writer was personally acquainted with a Roman Catholic school teacher who was persecuted by the Boxers, middlemen finally arranging that his life should be spared on payment of a fine of about thirty Mexican dollars. His father, however, begrudged the waste of so much money, and together with another son and a nephew tied up the son and his wife in the middle of the night and killed them with a sword, their little girl being thrown on the ground and stamped to death. Two small boys, however, made their escape. The people of the village, who had no sympathy whatever with Christianity, were so incensed at this inhumanity that they refused to assist in any way at the funeral.

It is worthy of notice that in many places the bitterest animosity extended even to those who had been treated in mission dispensaries, or whose connection with foreigners had been only temporary and casual. In cases where the number of those killed was large, sometimes amounting to quite half of the total membership, there was an additional percentage of those who thus suffered vicariously. There were, on the other hand, some who while not members of the church, nor even probationers, yet refused to renounce its teachings, thus forming an exoteric band of martyrs whose number will never be known.

Attention was early called to the important fact that in many places where the Chinese Church was about to be tested as never before, special strength was afforded them for the coming conflict. In Pekin, T'ung Chou, and Tientsin earnest meetings had recently been held, at which large numbers of the leading members of many churches had been brought near to God, and a similar experience was that of many mission stations in Shansi and Chihli which had been visited by Mr. William Cooper. Numbers of Christians afterwards testified that they had been thus unconsciously fortified for the terrible trials which proved to be so near.

The natural timidity and the clannishness of the Chinese is well known to those who have had intimate relations with them. It has been previously mentioned that both in Tientsin and in Pekin the greater part of the servants in every foreign establishment disappeared in a body upon the prospect of danger. It is important to recognize that the reverse was the case with the Christians, not merely where their safety was bound up with that of foreigners, but where they might, but for their fidelity, have easily escaped.

The most impressive instances of this are to be found where the peril to Chinese Christians was greatest, in the province of Shansi, where the governor had given formal authority to Boxers to kill all Christians, and where any one found writing letters to foreigners was slain without mercy. The foreign letters from those who were martyred in that province, continued in some cases to within a few hours before death and concealed at great risk by their converts, furnish the most ample evidence of the beautiful loyalty of the Christians, and of their fearful trials. In every mission headquarters the first quest was for the mission records, that the names of all the followers of the "foreign religion" might be certainly known. When these were discovered it went ill with the flock.

In repeated instances servants who had been sent away for their own safety returned on the eve of a riot, saying simply: "I heard that you were to be attacked to-night, and I thought that I ought to be here to help you." Many of them voluntarily served as couriers at the imminent risk of their lives, not once or twice, but constantly, and in this way it is known that many were killed. When the missionaries had been robbed of everything the poor Christians sometimes offered to them their own scanty hordes of silver or cash, saying that it was but right to do something for those to whom they owed so much. "As long as I have anything," said one such, "of course I will share it with you." Many Christians offered to find hiding places for the foreign pastors and the ladies, at the greatest risk to themselves, and others undertook the yet more difficult office of acting as their traveling stewards during their long and dangerous flight through hostile regions.

Some of the prominent preachers were intrusted by the missionaries with large sums of money, to be sent to whomsoever appeared to be in the greatest need. One of them thus became the steward of about £200, which at no little risk to himself he disbursed with great discretion in such a way as to assist materially many missionaries who had lost everything and who had no resources. An instance of this sort is of great weight as an aid in estimating the real character of the men who have embraced Christianity, and who are at once its apostles and its proof.

It is to be noted that the reports brought to the coast of the experiences of the foreigners in the interior, while greatly doubted at the time by some, afterwards proved to be exact even in details, and at the same time there was no apparent disposition on the part of those who had helped foreigners under these circumstances to pose as heroes. In a letter brought to light many months after the massacre of the English Baptist missionaries at Hsin Chou, Shansi, was known, it appeared that the Boxers had captured one of the leading Christians and had taken him to the hiding place of the missionaries that he might witness their death. With the certainty of immediate retribution this Christian uttered a loud cry of warning to his "pastor," and was immediately himself struck with a spear or sword as a reward.

An evangelist and his family were all dragged from their carts in a Honan village, and their baggage being thought insufficient for loot they were all—men and women—stripped of all their clothing and left naked in the street.

The manner in which the Christians met these terrible sufferings was a perpetual astonishment to their tormentors. They could not understand what inspired the calm courage of the tall and stalwart Teacher Liu, of Fên Chou Fu, who sat calmly in his room fanning himself and awaiting the advent of the Boxers who killed him instantly; nor that of the Pekin deacon who put on his best clothes and went out to meet them joyously, facing death with a smile. Was it any wonder that the Boxers, in their superstition, cut out the hearts of such people to endeavor by an inspection to ascertain the source of their more than human courage?

The belief that Christians were able to poison wells, and to turn paper images into real foreign soldiers, was practically universal, and accounted for much of the insensate fury of the Chinese against them. The notion also widely prevailed that within three days they would rise from the dead unless energetic steps were taken to prevent it. It was for this reason that so many were cut in pieces and burned, in exceptional cases the ashes being passed under stone rollers and dispersed to the winds. The same superstition also accounted for the entirely un-Chinese refusal to allow the bodies of Christians to receive any kind of burial. A convert in Pekin several times passed the corpse of his own mother lying in the street where she was struck down, but he dared not touch it.

The question has been often raised as to what the missionaries in China are doing, and what are the results of their work? They have been criticised as "idle and mischievous," but now that the Boxer rising has burst, we are told that "they have turned the world upside down." The statement is most literally true. The nature of the totally new energy widely diffused throughout the Chinese Empire may now be clearly perceived. It is one with the life manifested in the Roman Empire in the days briefly described in the Acts of the Apostles, and it is the only force adequate to cope with the gigantic ills of China. This proposition, to those who read the story of the sufferings of the native church in China discriminatingly, will be self-evident, while to others it will remain an idle claim.

The interest of the appended instances of the experiences of Christian Chinese is found not only in the occurrences themselves, but in the fact that these are such cases as have first come to hand, and that it would be possible to duplicate them by the thousand, until the aggregate product would be a series of volumes exceeding in bulk the Encyclopedia Britannica. These narratives need no other comment than a few explanations of technical terms, and bear within themselves the evidences of their fidelity to truth.

Attention has already been called to the fact that the spread of the Boxer movement was largely through young boys who were put under the influence of something like hypnotism, or mesmerism. The proportion of genuine subjects may have been small as compared with the spurious, but the influence of a single genuine case in a superstitious country like China would be great, where education, despite the claim of many influential Chinese, is no bar to the wildest credulity.

In many places the baneful effects of the movement became manifest to everyone, and often brought the whole Boxer propaganda into discredit. In one instance a lad of fifteen was so filled with the frenzy for murder that he attacked his own parents, an event which filled the villagers with horror, and led to the disbandment of the Boxer camp. Sometimes susceptible children would be so strongly affected with the impulse to perform the Boxer drill that they would go through with it irrespective of time or place. These occurrences made many reflective Chinese dread the unknown influence which they had evoked. When all the phenomena attending the Boxer development are attentively considered, there is reason to believe that many will come to the conclusion that if there is any such phenomenon in this world as "Demon possession," this was an instance of it.

The frequent expression "Boxer altar," it should be explained, does not refer to a place of worship, a pile of stone, nor even a table, but denotes the organization itself, the band as a whole, with its "Great Elder Brother" as leader, as well as the drill headquarters and the idol shrines before which tests were made by burning incense or paper. If the latter flamed high, the accused was innocent, but if the flame was feeble and deflected he was guilty and must be beheaded at once. The opportunity for fraud in all these ceremonies is obvious.

Among the many singular phenomena connected with the rise and spread of the Boxer sect nothing seems stranger or more in defiance of Chinese customs and the ideals of long generations than the accompanying organization of the "Hung Têng Chou," or "Red Lantern Light" society. This was composed of young girls between the ages of ten and twenty, just the age when Chinese maidens are most carefully hidden in the seclusion of their homes, when to go about in the streets would be in defiance of the proprieties, and to be exposed to public gaze would be for rich and poor alike disreputable.

These girls in large companies were taken to the temples, put under the low and vicious men who were the Boxer leaders, and after a certain amount of drill accompanied Boxer bands in their public parades. Their uniform was entirely of red, red cloth about their heads, red shoes on their feet, red banners in their hands. Their training was similar to that given Boxer boys, the repetition of charms by the leader, who was sometimes a man, sometimes a woman, following this the hypnotic trance, then a frenzy of desire to fight with sword or spear or gun.

The special power said to belong to these girls was to ride upon the clouds and to point out the houses of foreigners or their friends, Christians or others. From the clouds they could kindle a fire that would harm none but those proscribed. From the clouds, too, they could cause the iron battle ships of the enemy to burn like tinder.

During the weeks when riots and fighting were most violent, toward evening hundreds of ignorant, credulous people would gather outside their villages and watch the sun hastening to the west. The impression upon the retina caused by gazing at its disc, causing a round red spot to appear whenever the eye should turn, was pronounced the magic light of the "Red Lantern," and excited cries of "There are two!" "I see three!" "There are a great many in the north!" would fill the air. Then when the evening clouds gave back the sunset glow, this common sight took on the aspect of the supernatural, and the people would whisper to each other "Truly the power of the Red Lantern is very great! With it we must conquer the foreigners!"

These stories of Chinese persecution may fitly conclude with the citation of a significant testimony in regard to the relative qualities of the Chinese Christians, from a paper read at the Newcastle Church Congress, by the most accomplished lady traveler of the day, Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop, who began her extended journeying with little or no interest in missions, and who has ended with a sincere devotion to mission activity, after having enjoyed unequaled advantages for learning at first hand what is accomplished by the effort to elevate the men and the women of the East.

"Everywhere small, ofttimes very small, communities of persons had been formed, who by their abandonment of ancestral worship and idolatrous social customs were subjected to a social ostracism, and who partly in consequence clung together as brethren, with a tenacity similar to that which finds its secular expression in the powerful Chinese organizations known as 'guilds.' These converts live pure and honest lives, they are teachable, greedy of Bible knowledge, generous and self-denying for Christian purposes, and so anxious to preserve the purity of their brotherhood that it would be impossible for such abuses as disfigured the church at Corinth to find a place in the infant churches of China. Above all, every true convert becomes a missionary, and it is in this spirit of propagandism that the hope of the future lies. After eight and a half years of journeyings among Asiatic peoples, I say unhesitatingly that the raw material out of which the Holy Ghost fashions the Chinese convert, and ofttimes the Chinese martyr, is the best stuff in Asia."

XXXV.—PERSONAL NARRATIVES.

KAO HSIN.

Kao Hsin is a graduate of college and seminary, and has been in charge of the preparatory station school at T'ung Chou. This was closed at mission meeting time, and after the meeting he went to his home 15 li away. In a few days he came back to learn of the condition of things. He found only one man, Mr. Lin, in the city compound, who told him that the missionaries had gone to Pekin and the church members had scattered, and advised him to get his family and follow to Pekin.

While they were speaking a man came from Yung Lê Tien and told them of the murder of the preacher, Li Tê Kuei, while making his escape with his wife and three of his children. His three older children were pupils in T'ung Chou and Pekin schools. Mrs. Li was Kao's own sister. She had pleaded for her baby, as it was such a fine boy. The Boxers looked at it and said: "Yes; uncommonly fine! It might be an emperor some day; it must be killed first." So they dispatched the children, hacking them with swords and burning them. They killed at the same time several church members who were escaping with the helper.

As Mr. Kao was starting back for his home he met a messenger from P'ing Ku Hsien, where Deacon Li Wên Jung was stationed, 40 miles from T'ung Chou. He had come to bring word to the deacon's mother that her son was ill with fever and the invalid wife unable to care for him, and to beg for help. After directing the man to the deacon's mother's home, Mr. Kao went back to Fu Hê, his home.

About dark the P'ing Ku messenger reappeared, saying there was no one to go the deacon's help. Mr. Kao had told his family about the fate of the Christians at Yung Lê Tien and other places and consulted with them about plans for escape. His mother, an efficient, energetic woman, said: "We are all natives of this village and our neighbors will not want to harm us women. You and your nephew go to P'ing Ku, where there are no Boxers, and you will be safe yourselves and able to help the sick deacon and his family. We will scatter among our relatives in the village, and I will stay and care for the house.

Mr. Kao begged that they all go to Pekin, but she thought her plan the safer one. His feelings overcame him and she said: "Don't cry, my son. Can we not bear this for Christ? If Jesus saves us we will be reunited. If we are taken, we die for Him. Can we not trust Him? Go quickly."

She prepared them a meal, and at 11 o'clock at night Mr. Kao and his nephew, the eldest son of the murdered helper, Li Tê Kuei, set out, a neighbor going with them to bring back word to the mother.

They reached P'ing Ku the next day at noon and found the deacon's wife in distress at the situation, her husband ill, and no cart or animals to be hired to take them back to T'ung Chou. She had had been praying that God would open the way before them. Mr. Kao advised them to remain, as it was quiet there, and if it grew dangerous the mountains were near where they could hide.

The next day was Sunday, and the little company of Christians gathered for service. One from a hamlet not far away in the hills consented to let Mrs. Li and the children go to his home, though they had only millet and salt and water to give her. They stole out in the early morning, Mrs. Li walking some distance to meet the donkey sent for her. After seeing her safe in the new hiding place Mr. Kao and the sick husband returned to P'ing Ku, where they remained another week.

Conditions grew worse all the time. The evil reports about Christians as poisoning wells and smearing blood on the doors were started in the city. They were threatened with being bound ready for delivery to the Boxers when these should reach the city. A friendly yamen runner told them these things and advised them to leave, giving the name of friends, one 40 and one 80 li away. Mr. Kao and his nephew decided to go. Deacon Li at first remained behind, but soon joined his wife and started on his own long wanderings. They were separated from that time on.

The first man mentioned would only give them one meal and sent them on. After going a short distance they were in the mountain gorges with no plain road. Bewildered and knowing not where to go, they stopped and prayed to God to guide where there was no man to ask. Two crows flew overhead, and they asked that they might fly in the direction they ought to take. They flew northeast. This took them back to their unwilling host, whom they begged to escort them a few li. He was afraid and refused, but a caller came in who lived on that very road, and he offered to direct them.

It was cloudy and threatened rain, and they begged this guide to take them to his home for the night. He did so, and they had hardly entered the house when the rain fell in torrents. For ten days they remained there working hard for their board. They had said that they were Christians, so that when, soon after, a Boxer altar was started there the wife of the man was frightened and wanted them to go, giving them money to help them on their way.

The nephew was homesick and begged to return to their home. They started back, but in a few li met Yang Erh, a chair bearer for a member of the T'ung Chou Mission. He had been to P'ing Ku twice as messenger, but was now fleeing for his own life. He told how he had been pursued by Boxers and had seen them cut down others on the road, and said that neither T'ung Chou nor Tientsin were safe for any Christians.

Mr. Kao and his nephew, with Yang Erh, turned back to the northeast and went on outside the pass. The wild rumors about Christians were everywhere and believed by everyone. The rumors said that the Christians smeared blood on the doors, which would make some one in the household go crazy and kill all the family; that they poisoned wells so that the water would destroy those who drank it; that foreigners were selling sheepskins and goatskins and would later turn them all into live sheep and dogs and men. The sheep would hunt people and destroy the crops, the dogs would bite people and make them go mad, but the men were worst of all, as they could not be conquered. If these sheep or dogs or men were struck, they turned back into sheepskins or goatskins. The great trade of foreigners in black pig's bristles was said to be for the purpose of performing incantations over them, by which they would turn into evil insects that would fly about and bite like a mosquito, the bite proving fatal. The Boxers claimed that they alone could avert all these evils.

No one was allowed to stay at an inn, as it was said that foreigners hired beggars, fortune-tellers, traveling priests, and peddlers to scatter blood and medicine. Every suspicious stranger was searched. If any bottle was found on his person they were sure it was medicine and the man was at once cut to pieces.

It was necessary to appear unconcerned and walk boldly to the crowds or inns, as any attempt to avoid notice at once awoke suspicion. They must have a reasonable explanation for their journeying, so they gave as a reason that they were going north in search of a debtor who had owed his uncle a debt, to get payment for the same. As they several times got work for a few days in the fields, they could say that they were searching for work on account of drought on the plain. The poppy harvest was ready for the first slashing of the seed pods, and many come every year to do this work.

At one stage they joined a traveler, who proved most kind to them, took them to his village, found work for them with a rich man of the place, cared for Mr. Kao during several days' illness, and adopted him and Yang Erh as "sworn brothers" and the nephew as a "dry son." His kindness was the bright spot in the long, sorrowful summer.

While at this man's village word came of the destruction of everything foreign in Pekin except the British legation and the cathedral, and with a heavy heart Mr. Kao thought of all his fellow-Christians as gone. At last the news of the victories of the allies in Pekin reached them in the mountains and they started back for the plains.

Not far from his old home Kao Hsin met an acquaintance, who exclaimed on seeing him, "Why are you here?" "I want to see my home and my family!" "Alas! You have no home to see, and your family are all dead, killed by the Boxers." Then the dreadful details were told of how his mother was cut to pieces; all his children but one little deaf girl killed with his wife; all the Christians of the village, with nearly all of their relatives, more than thirty in all, killed in most cruel ways. The aged grandmother, over 84 years old, was a midwife, and nearly all the villagers up to 40 years of age had been brought into the world by her; so many begged for her and she was spared. "One old woman and one little girl can do nothing to avenge those killed!" they said contemptuously. They had searched everywhere for Kao Hsin, but said he was a wizard of such power he could burrow in the earth and escape. They feared he would come with an earthquake to destroy them.

Mr. Kao had traveled 30 miles that day and had 6 more to go. He staggered on, almost sleeping as he walked. At last he crawled under a mat shed in which were dead bodies and tried to sleep a little, but was awakened every little while by firing guns and barking dogs. At daylight some Russian soldiers impressing workmen found them and drove them to some boats to unload supplies. There was a motley crowd of coolies, merchants, teachers, rich men, poor men—all kinds in the line. Their burdens were heavy, and if they did not handle them just right they were beaten. Kao Hsin felt the lash because he dropped a box too quickly. After a supper he slept on the wet ground with no bedding.

The next day he was harnessed in with some men to drag cannon over the stone road outside the city near to the ruins of the college. One man fell; the wheel ran over his leg and broke it. Another, who thought such a life too bitter to endure, jumped into the moat as they went over the bridge and was drowned. That night they were well fed and given dry clothes. After a little they were better treated, were given three meals a day, and paid 10 cents besides.

He remained a month in all, thinking the Christians all dead and himself the sole survivor and that the missionaries would all have been sent home. So he made no effort to get away. One day he met a T'ung Chou church member on the streets and learned the good news that many were saved. His presence in T'ung Chou was reported to the mission in Pekin, and he was soon passed over to the Americans and sent up to the capital.

DEACON LI.

To find a Christian in a Chinese yamen reminds one of the "saints in Nero's household." Yet it was in such a place that Li Yün Shêng was converted, and it was in pursuing the duties of that place that he led for twelve years a consistent Christian life. He was known as a man faithful to duty, one who took no bribes and shared no "spoils of office." He had the respect of the official in T'ung Chou and of his associates in the yamen. Such a man was a shining mark for the malignity of the Boxers. He had seen the burning of the mission buildings and boldly denounced the deed. "Your punishment will come," he said, "and these buildings will be restored." When the massacres began, the official at the head of the yamen took Mr. Li under his own protection and found a small, retired room where he was hidden. When the Boxers came to the yamen and demanded the Christian in hiding, they refused to give him up.

At last the Boxers, who had no respect for dignitaries, broke into the yamen and began a search. Mr. Li was taken by the official's command into the apartments of the women. But the Boxers penetrated to that court and soon found their victim. He was dragged out and taken to an altar near by, where they put him to death. His wife was a very timid woman, and when she heard of her husband's death she went to a pit of water not far away, leading her little daughter, and the two plunged into the water together.

Deacon Li was buried, but the word went around among the Boxers that so zealous a Christian would rise from the dead in a short time, so his body was exhumed and burned to ashes.

THE UNKNOWN MARTYRS.

Among those who died for their faith in this field were many whose names are unknown, but whose steadfastness in the face of death produced so much wonder among the heathen that their stories are being told by those who "were consenting" by looking on silently when they were condemned.

At P'ing Ku Hsien two men were taken to the "Great Elder Brother" of the Boxers for his decision as to which was guilty of following the foreign religion. After repeating his incantations, he turned and pointed to one, and said: "This is one of them." The man was led away and killed, the other one was released. He turned away and went off a little distance, then came back to the Boxers. "What are you coming back for? You can go," they said, He replied, "Kill me, too. I, too, am one of them." And they led him to where his friend had died and there killed him.

At the T'ung Chou north gate two boys of 13 and 14 years of age were making their escape into the country when the Boxers seized them to question them. These nameless young confessors said, boldly, "We are of the Jesus Church." When about to be bound they said, "You need not bind us. We will not try to get away. Every step we take to your altar is one step nearer heaven." And they soon joined the victors above.

DEACON HÊNG.

[As told by himself.]

"On returning to Pekin from annual meeting we found the danger and excitement in the city had greatly increased. A council was held and, soon after, the missionaries and the girls of Bridgman School were removed to the Methodist Mission, while many of the men of the church remained to guard the mission. On the evening of June 13, a man came rushing to the chapel saying, 'The Boxers have entered the city and are setting fire to the missions.' I went into the street and could see the smoke of the Methodist-street Chapel and of the London Mission rising to the south of us. The streets were full of excited people, saying, 'They will come here next! These will be the next to die!' After a short consultation we decided we could not defend the buildings and could only try to save our lives by flight.

"There were many who saw me and knew me, but I made my way to the north part of the city where I was least known, and as it was dark I hid in a temple near the northwest gate. From there I saw the burning of the two Presbyterian missions and farther south the smoke and flames of our own mission.

"I rested part of the night, but rose at 3 a. m. and went to the Presbyterian Mission, which was still burning, and saw the bodies of those killed during the night, some of them in the burning buildings, some outside in the courts. I went to the An Ting gate, but it was closed, not to be opened till noon. After wandering around I came back to the northeast gate. I met several Christians of our own and other missions, but no one showed signs of recognition. Later we went out through the gate together, each making for his own place of refuge.

"I went to a village 8 li away to warn a Christian family living there. They gave me food and I rested for a time, after which I went back to the city by the An Ting gate, which was now open. There were many bodies of the Christians lying along the road, of which I recognized one as a colporteur who had been killed while carrying his books on his back. There were men and women, young and old, among them. I then went from one to another of my relatives, but none would let me remain. I went to the yamen where I have duties, but was told there was no place for me.

"For a day or two I wandered about getting food and shelter as best I could. At last I went to my uncle and he said he would try to get me out of the city safely, but could not keep me, as it would surely bring ruin to them all.

"They advised me to shave my head and put on the garments of a Buddhist priest, but I was not willing to wear that garb. Finally they brought me the outfit of a fortune teller, the mystic character of the 'Book of Changes,' and wrote out for me enough couplets for twenty fortunes. Then my uncle put on his Manchu robes for ceremonial service, gave a suit to me, and we rode out of the city as official and attendant. No one challenged me. He went a few miles with me, gave me money for my journey, and we separated.

"I went to the village at the north where there were Christians, but found them scattered; went on to another place and found the Boxers were everywhere. I still went north, and after a few days reached a valley among the mountains where a large branch of our family lived.

"After waiting two days at an inn, and no one appearing whom I knew, I decided to turn back to the city to learn the fate of our church. I went to a few fairs on the way, spread out my table, told a few fortunes, always watching for familiar faces. At last I met three Christians, who told me of the siege of foreigners and Christians at the legation and North Cathedral. They said we could not go to the city yet—it was not certain that anyone would survive the fierce attack.

"So again I turned north, this time in company with these three. We traveled by twos, and stopped at different inns. One of them soon hired out to a farmer and the others found other work, but I was not strong enough to be of any use, so I went to fairs and told fortunes, working my way back to the north to my relatives. Sometimes I was tempted to end my days in a river or to jump from a precipice, but I held back from that sin, feeling that God would care for me or take me to Himself.

"At last I reached again the home of my relatives. There were some 16 families in the hamlet, all of our clan. I went to the head man, who was the only one of an older generation—an uncle. There were four of my own generation whom I could call 'brothers.' I could not tell them of my being a Christian, but did tell them of how Pekin was in a state of chaos and ruin, with fighting in the streets and robbers and Boxers everywhere. I had fled for safety, and must ask them to give me refuge until the country should become quiet. They consulted together and agreed to share in keeping me. There I remained until after the New Year. They were poor people, but they gave me food such as they had and money enough for me to buy a sheep-skin garment and other clothes for winter. I was kept in the house for more than a month by sickness.

"As the weather grew warmer I could wait no longer, but turned back to the plain to see if any of our church survived. The roads and inns were full of dispersed soldiers. Several times I told their fortunes and gave them the truth. I told them they could not succeed in fighting foreigners, but had been deceived by the Boxers and had better give up being soldiers and go to their homes. They were not angry at this, but paid my food and lodging and treated me kindly. I made my way to the city gate, where the Japanese were in charge. I could not make myself understood, but found my way back to our old street.

"There I saw a notice in foreign letters on the gate, and came inside and found myself in the presence of those whom I had thought dead. The Lord has brought me back. I am far from perfect. The Lord has not done teaching me, so He has let me live on to finish His work in me."

MRS. LI PÊN YUAN (DORCAS).

Li Pên Yuan is one of the younger preachers of the American Board Mission, and Dorcas, his wife, is a worthy helpmeet. She was educated in the Bridgman School, and is a woman attractive in person and of a lovely Christian character.

On the night when the missions were burned in Pekin Mr. and Mrs. Li were visiting the brother of the former in a distant part of the city. The brother was a preacher of the Presbyterian mission. As the mob drew near that place they all fled together, but after going a little distance the two families separated so as to attract the less attention. Mr. Li found a retired corner in the angle of some house, where he left his wife and child, while he went on to the great street to look about. She could see him standing at the corner, not many rods away, when a crowd of Boxers come along. He knew it would not do to run, so followed along as one of the crowd till he could turn aside unnoticed and make his way back to his wife. She had seen him apparently swept along by the crowd, and as a long time elapsed and he did not return she gave him up as lost.

She finally came out from hiding and worked her way slowly back across the city to the American Board Mission, which was burning when she reached it. Wandering about from one place to another, she finally sat down in front of a large gate of a strange family and rested till the morning broke. Soon after light a band of Boxers came along and seeing the lonely woman and child marked them with bloodhound instinct as refugee Christians. Just as they stopped in front of Dorcas the gentleman of the place, an entire stranger to her, came out, took in the situation at a glance, and said to the Boxers, "You are mistaken. This is a neighbor of mine." His word was taken and the mob went on, leaving her there.

She told her story to this "good Samaritan" and he went with her to a village near the eastern city gate, where she had relatives living. They found the house destroyed and the people fled. The man who was trying to save her then said they were expecting a visit from a relative named Li and she must represent that relative to their family and go to his home till some other plan could be made. The women at first received her cordially, but after a little suspicions arose and then she told her story to them. They would not let her remain. The man begged them to keep the little one, but they refused that, too. As Dorcas left the house he said to his wife, "The one good act of my life you will not let me do!"

She went back near the mission, from one old neighbor to another, none of whom would receive her. She appealed to a police station, to a man who knew her husband, but he drove her roughly away. Toward night she sat down on some logs near a lumber yard, but was soon told to "move on," and when she said she had no place to go the man pointed down a blind alley and said, "You can wait there." There was nothing to wait for but death.

Just then a carter of the mission came along, saw her, and called her by name. She went to his cart and got inside. He quickly dropped the curtain and drove up and down the streets for hours trying to find some place of refuge. At midnight he drove into a cart-stand yard and received permission to keep his cart and mule there for the night. Dorcas spent that night in the cart. The little child of only two years, a bright winsome little one, seemed to know she must keep quiet and did not cry once in the night.

The next morning at earliest dawn they drove away and went to a village where some Christians were known to have taken refuge, and there she remained until word was taken to her husband, who came and took her to the Methodist mission. They had been separated from Wednesday night till Saturday morning and he had searched all over the city for her.

THE T'SAI FAMILY.

This family is one of the oldest Protestant Christian families in North China, the present head of it, Mr. T'sai Fu Yuan, being of the second generation of Christians. He has been a preacher for nearly twenty years, and their home has been a center for the church of the Yü Chou region.

By the latter part of June the whole city and region were aflame with the Boxers. Mr. T'sai was in the city with his family. His aged mother, who shared the universal Chinese dread of extinction of the family, saw the approaching crisis and told her son and grandson that they must flee while it was yet possible. After vainly protesting they at last yielded and left the city about the middle of July. They first went to Hsi Hê Ying, where there were other Christians, but found that place still worse than Yü Chou, as the large Catholic Church drew the Boxers to its attack from the whole region around. He then went on to Pai Lu, where he had friends, but soon left them and took refuge in the watchtower of a melon patch, where a Catholic old lady was also in hiding. He remained in this place until he learned of the destruction of his home and the death of all his family except the son who was with him.

The crisis in Yü Chou culminated about the last of July, when a large body of Boxers passed through on their way to attack the Catholic Church of Hsi Hê Ying. At that time a mob surrounded the Mission place and led out the women to a temple near by, locking them within. Then the chapel and homes were looted and burned, after which the crowd scattered, leaving the women in the temple without even a guard. Toward night they were able to escape and went back to their ruined home. They found two small side rooms which had not been destroyed and went into these to prepare some food for themselves.

In a little time some rowdies of the city came to pick up anything that might remain in the ruins and found the women there. They raised the cry and gathered the Boxers again. Some demanded that they all be killed, and some of the baser of the crowd suggested that the young women might be sold to the public houses for a good sum. At this the blind old grandmother raised her voice and said, "We are not that kind! Kill us if you want! We can die!"

The Boxers being on their way to battle did not wish to defile their swords with the blood of women. so led them to the well in the court and threw them in, one after another, burying each with stones and earth as she was cast in. In this way it is thought six perished, though there are rumors that two were carried away and given to a military official.

PASTOR MÊNG CHI HSIEN.

Pastor Mêng Chi Hsien was the oldest of the younger body of preachers in the mission of the American Board, who had been trained from youth in the mission schools. For eleven years he had been an ordained pastor at Pao Ting Fu. He was a man of strong convictions, of great energy, was a natural leader, beloved and trusted by all.

He and his younger brother, Pastor Mêng Chi Tsêng, attended the annual meeting of the mission at T'ung Chou, both taking prominent parts in the meetings. While these were in progress, tidings came that the railroad was destroyed and communication with Pao Ting Fu cut off. Mr. Mêng decided to return at once to stand by Mr. Pitkin's side in the perils and perplexities of the hour. He went overland, most of the way on foot. The three devoted missionaries at Pao Ting Fu, Mr. Pitkin, Miss Morrell, and Miss Gould, who were cut off from all hope of escape, were quietly going on with their work for the church.

During the month of June Mr. Mêng, with other preachers, and returned college students, opened the street chapel daily. They saw the gathering storm and advised the church members to leave the city, helping them to choose places of escape, but these preachers and the Bible readers deliberately decided to remain at their posts.

They said: "Our missionaries have remained with us; we will stand by them and live or die together." They could have escaped had they fled. All who went away did escape. They chose to stay, although they saw more clearly than their foreign friends the inevitable results.

One man, a lifelong friend of Mr. Mêng, said to him, "We have lived together; now we will die together." "No," said the pastor; "my place is here with our missionaries. I shall stay, but you must take my oldest son and get away. If you escape and he is spared, he will represent me and carry on my work." So the friend took the son, a fine boy of 15, and went away. After many dangerous experiences during the summer he brought him safely to Tientsin after the arrival of the allies.

Friday afternoon of June 27, Pastor Mêng was at the street chapel packing books and furniture, preparing to remove from the rented building, as notice to do so had been given by the owner.

Suddenly a company of Boxers came into the chapel, seized him, bound him, and carried him to their altar in a temple in the southeast corner of the city. The first blow had fallen upon the mainstay of the native church. He was beheaded at the altar, his head exposed as that of a criminal, while the body was buried like a pauper's near the city wall.

Nine months later to a day a great memorial service for the martyred missionaries and Christians was held at Pao Ting Fu, attended by the chief officials of the city and witnessed by thousands of silent spectators. In the stately funeral procession were banners and flags, embroidered catafalques, native musicians, a long line of carts filled with mourning friends, and ahead of all, about thirty memorial banners, more than half of which were to the memory of this noble man. They were no empty show, but gave the last true estimate of the best men of the city, officials and merchants, guilds and citizens, of the life and character that had been lived in their midst.

CHANG CH'ING HSIANG.

Chang Ch'ing Hsiang was a member of the senior class of the North China College, and had returned to Pao Ting Fu at the close of the college year, taking part in the work of the station up to the time when the storm broke upon the mission.

The night that the elder Pastor Mêng was seized by the Boxers was a sleepless one in the mission. All felt that they were doomed to death, and it was only a question of time. Toward morning, Ch'ing Hsiang's mother, who was one of the Bible women, came to him and said: "There is no need for all to die. You are young and may have many years of work for the Lord. I shall stay and die with Miss Morrell. You must try to escape."

Starting out in the early dawn he first went to their home to get money and an extra garment, then turned south to a place 25 miles away where there were Christians. Arriving at the town toward night he found the streets alive with Boxers coming in from the country, and knew it was no place of refuge, so turned back to retrace his steps. He was pursued a few li by some villagers who noticed his being a stranger and alone. As night came on it rained heavily, and in the darkness and storm he made his way on the railroad back to his home. His sister met him with the warning to flee at once, as search had been made for him. He had had no sleep for two nights, his limbs were swollen, and every step was painful, but his friends led him out a few li and he set his face toward the hills.

He fixed on a town a hundred miles away as his destination, and, knowing that single travelers were viewed with suspicion, soon joined some merchants going to that place. After reaching there he decided to go into Shansi, not knowing that it would be entering the tiger's den. He soon joined an official train whose followers were friendly, and with them made the journey all the way to T'ai Yuan Fu. Arriving there he learned that already a large number of missionaries had been killed, and he himself saw a Boxer mob chase down some Catholic Christians.

His money was almost gone, and he turned his face back to Pao Ting Fu, hoping the worst would be over when he should have again made the long journey. After going 30 miles he found that he had taken a branch road to T'ai Ku, and was only 10 miles from the city. His classmate, K'ung Hsiang Hsi lived there, and, although not knowing whether he were yet alive, he decided to try to find him. Entering the city he found the missionaries were still living, and made his way to the gate. It was very closely guarded, as spies had visited them, and his ragged, travel-worn appearance excited suspicion, so that the door was shut in his face.

He finally met his friend, and they found a hiding place in a village not far away. After the mission was destroyed he was again in great peril, and after a hasty visit to his friends, he started to return to Chihli. He soon joined other travelers of his own province, and in their company made the long journey out of Shansi safely.

He then turned south to a village where there were Christians, and a good deacon took him in and treated him as a brother. He had journeyed over a thousand miles on foot, had an ulcer on one leg, and his feet were covered with blisters. His clothes were in tatters, and his shoes almost gone. He received the kindest care, his needs were supplied, and he was soon able to join them in the harvest fields and work with them till news came that foreign troops had entered Pao Ting Fu. Then the deacon went with him to keep him company. The friends at Pao Ting Fu received him as one from the dead, having heard repeatedly that he had been killed in Shansi.

His experiences illustrate those of hundreds who wandered from one place of hiding to another, suspected, hunted, in danger every moment of being recognized, not knowing each morning but the new day might be their last. The marvel is that so many were able to escape the constant perils, and survive as witnesses to the providential care of their God.

MRS. HUO'S STORY.

"When we saw the danger increasing around us,[a] I said to my husband: 'We must not all die. You must go away and hide. They are not so likely to kill me and the children as to kill you. If I am spared, you can hunt me up afterwards. If not it will be God's will.' So I baked him some cakes, rolled up his quilt and some clothes, and then had to fairly push him out of the door.

"After the mission houses were burned the Boxers came and took me and the children to their altar for trial. As we started I begged them to let me say a few words. 'You want to talk now do you?' 'If you will let me. If not I will keep silent.' 'Well, talk ahead!' So I told them how we had lived there many years, how our neighbors all knew we had quarreled with no one, had offended no one, how my husband was gone and I was alone with my little children. Would they not be merciful to me and the little ones? Some of the bystanders said: 'What a pity to destroy the children!'

"They put chains on my hands and feet as I sat on the ground and then ordered me to get up. I tried several times in vain, then told them it was impossible, and finally said my body was 'inconvenient' and I could not rise without help. They then called two women who belonged to the jail to attend to women prisoners, and they led me to the prison, where I spent seventy-two days. They gave me coarse food and drink. After twenty days my baby was born. The official had ordered clothing for the child and extra food for me; but these things did not reach me, being kept by the guards. The little one lived only three weeks. I did not know the fate of my poor children, from whom I had been separated; but I prayed God every day to spare their lives and restore them to me.

"After a time two other Christians, a mother and a daughter who had given themselves up to the Boxers voluntarily, were put in with me, and we comforted each other. They were alone and knew they could not escape, so they went to the Boxer leaders and told them plainly that they were Christians and would not give up Christ and they could kill them at once. The Boxers did them no harm, but shut them up in the prison and they came through safely with me.

"There was another woman prisoner there, one who had been very wicked and who was awaiting her sentence at the law, expecting death. She was friendly and anxious to know about us, so we talked freely together. One day I asked her: 'If you must die, have you anyone to help you in the next world?' 'No; no one,' she said. I said: 'We have some one. We are not afraid to die.' So I told her about Jesus who died for us and who takes away the fear of death. She was a very bright woman and learned quickly. We taught her to pray, and she learned to trust in Christ to forgive her many sins. I told her at last: 'If they come to deliver us, you may tell them you are a Christian too, now, only you must never go back to your old life of sin.'

"Sure enough, when the foreign soldiers let us out she too was released. The interpreter for the troops was a missionary, and he asked her many questions to test her knowledge of the truth, and she answered them well. She has gone back to her father's home in a distant village, and I am going there to see her as soon as it is safe for me to walk there. The Lord saved me, body and soul; why shouldn't I try to save some one else body and soul?

"After a time, before the soldiers came, we heard that some foreigners had been brought to the prison. 'Could it be Pastor Ewing, come to try and save us? Were they to be killed?' we asked. 'No,' the guard said, and then added: 'You need not worry; no one will kill them or you now.' I did not then know that they meant that the foreign armies were in Pekin, and every one was afraid of their vengeance, but I felt sure we were safe and would in some way be delivered. In time I learned that the foreigners were Mr. and Mrs. Green and their party.

"At last the time came when they brought us out of prison and restored my four children to me. They had been taken to the city orphanage and cared for during my long stay in prison. They were sick and wasted from poor fare and lack of mother's care, but they had not been unkindly treated. After a time my husband came back, so we were all spared to each other. God has been very good to us. My children are His to do with just what He wants."

DR. CH'IU.

Dr. Ch'iu was a former student with Dr. Atterbury at Pekin, who was carrying on an independent practice and had a medicine shop of his own.

As the Boxer altars multiplied in the city and danger to Christians increased, Dr. Ch'iu became alarmed for his own safety. He is very lame, and this made it harder for him, rendering him conspicuous, and making it difficult for him to flee. This led him to go out of the city to relatives in a village a few li away before the attack on the missions began. His relatives refused to allow him to remain, so after vainly trying to find a hiding place he returned to the city. Not long after that the great outbreak occurred. His shop of foreign medicines was looted, and his home also. He was seized by the Boxers and taken to their altar. In his fright he yielded to their demands and burned insense to their idols.

They were still bent on killing him, when some one suggested that he be kept alive to dress the wounds of those who had been wounded during the attack on the legations. With this in view they took him to a temple, where there were over 30 suffering from wounds, lying on the steps or in the court or one of the rooms, while in another large room lay more than 20 bodies of those already killed. These bodies were to be kept, as the Boxer leaders promised that after a few days all would rise from the dead and again join them in exterminating Christians and foreigners.

For more than ten days Dr. Ch'iu was kept a close prisoner in this court, the decaying bodies of the dead and the groans of the living all about him, his own life depending on his success in healing those under his care. His guards never left him day or night. He knew it would be impossible for some of the wounded to recover, having no medicines or appliances to use for them, and he quietly waited the end, praying for forgiveness for yielding in the matter of burning incense.

Then came a sudden turn in affairs. A wealthy village had been pillaged by Boxers, although not related to the proscribed classes, foreigners or Christians. Their leading men came into the city and entered complaint, and the company at the temple where Dr. Ch'iu was confined were summoned to appear. Some went to the official and the rest fled, leaving no guard. This was the opportunity for flight, but to flee into the streets was vain, as others would seize him. He succeeded in sending a message to his older brother, who came with a cart and took him to his home. This brother was a heathen and not in danger for himself, and although during the days of attack he had refused shelter to his brother, he now took him in and hid him away, and for two months succeeded in keeping him from the Boxers. When the troops came in he was taken by the missionaries to a place of safety.

WÊN LI.

One of Miss Newton's school girls, Wên Li, was betrothed to a young doctor, Mr. Ma, of one of the leading families of the Presbyterian Mission.[a] Wên Li's own mother was not a Christian, and was out at service in a wealthy Chinese household. As Wên Li had no home when the school was disbanded, she was sent to her future mother-in-law.

The family desired to have a wedding in the usual manner—to send the bride to a friend's house, and have her brought in a red bridal chair; but the streets were so disorderly and the mobs so rude that they feared a wedding among Christians would attract notice and lead to trouble, so the matter was delayed from day to day. One day Mr. Ma received notice that they must give up their rented house to their landlord. They went to the mission, where a few empty rooms were found, and there they made a temporary home. It then seemed best to have a quiet wedding which should place the young bride in better position to receive the protection of her husband.

That very night the mission houses were burned. A company of native Christians hid away in a court where there were trees and shrubs, but the light of the burning buildings betrayed their presence and they were pursued and struck with knives and axes. They made their escape but were soon separated. Wên Li, with her husband's sister, hid in a ruined temple, the front of which was burning, so that the smoke of the fire gave them a veil as they crouched against the brick wall in the rear. By morning this hiding place was searched, and those in hiding were taken to the Boxer altar to be tested. Wên Li was released, but the sister-in-law was killed.

The same day the young husband was also taken again and was put to death. Wên Li, the bride of a few hours was left alone, a widow. She carried two severe wounds on her neck from the Boxer knife, and in pain and terror made her way to her mother. But her mother could not keep her, and after going from place to place she was taken into the home of a sister of Wên Yen, a schoolmate, where she remained two months. The husband of the family was a Boxer, but he gave these girls his protection. They had to suffer from his reproaches and constant efforts to make them recant.

One day he said to them, "I am bearing a bad name on your account. I am accused of making you my lower wives. I must give you up to the Boxers unless you recant." His wife then said, "We have protected them so long they must not die now." Wên Li was ill from her unhealed wounds and was discouraged, so when he lit a stick of incense and said, "You've only to kneel while this is burning and then you will be safe," she could hold out no longer. The wife took pity on her distress of mind and body and broke off the incense stick to only an inch or two, to make the time the shorter. As the poor girl told her story she broke down weeping, and asked me to pray for her forgiveness for yielding in the time of trial.

At the close of the siege she was taken to the place where the mission had established itself, and with care and kindness soon recovered. She was later again married to a young man whose fiancée had been killed during the Boxer reign of terror.

MR. CHANG AND MR. WÊN.

After the allied troops reached Pekin, Mr. Tewksbury, with a company of helpers, went to T'ung Chou to learn the fate of the Christians who had not gone with them to Pekin. They also went to the deserted yamens, gathering up documents which should give evidence as to Boxer leaders and their victories.

Among the papers of the city magistrate was one stating the trial of a Mr. Chang, of the London Mission. His home was in a village near T'ung Chou, but his business was in Pekin. When the city became full of Boxers, all business was broken up, and Mr. Chang went to his home and took his family and fled. Being recognized, he was seized by the Boxers, stripped of clothing, bound with ropes upon a cart, and carried to T'ung Chou to the official yamen. The cords had worn off the flesh so that he was already covered with bleeding wounds when taken to his trial.

On being questioned he plainly stated his faith. He said that he had been several years in business when he was attracted to the street chapel of the London Mission. The more he heard of the Jesus doctrine the more he considered it a good doctrine, and after attending church for a year he was baptized. He said: "This is my faith. I am ready to invite death. I am not afraid to die, and shall not give up my religion." The writer wrote out his statement and he affixed his mark, the impress of his second finger. He then knelt down and began to pray, when the official left the court and the Boxers fell upon him and hacked him in pieces.

Later his son gave a statement of his death fully agreeing with the official record. Still later the magistrate, when discussing with the missionary the terms of indemnity, also told of this man's trial, and then added: "How could I save his life when he said right out where all could hear him that he was a Christian?" That a man could die for his faith was beyond the heathen official's power to comprehend.

A Mr. Wên, with his wife and child, of the same mission, were taken to Prince Chuang's place by the Boxers, but through the influence of a friend were released. As they were leaving, Mr. Wên was again seized, his head was shaved, he was loaded with chains, and taken to the country from village to village, the Boxers claiming that they were taking him to Pekin for punishment, but lacked funds. After levying money in one village, they moved to another. In every place Mr. Wên was subjected to insult and indignity from the crowds. While being led about in this way, the news reached his captors that the allies had arrived, upon which they all took to their heels. Mr. Wên hastened to the capital, which he reached safely, and later learned that his wife and child had found refuge in the country, so that they were soon reunited.

MR. CHIANG.

Mr. Chiang, of the London Mission, was 67 years old, a very saintly Christian, and a great Bible student. He was taken safely to the Methodist Mission, but was anxious about his youngest daughter, who was still in the conntry, and wanted to leave his shelter to find her. At the first opportunity he slipped away and was not seen again.

On his way to the country home he was pointed out to the Boxers. They seized him and told him they should kill him. He asked for a little time to pray, and, falling on his knees, he began, "Father, forgive them——" But his prayer was not completed. The knives fell on him as he knelt and he was hacked to pieces.

her husband in this way: In an unfrequented spot he built a stone hut leaning against a blank wall. It was about 4 feet square on the ground and 6 feet high, with neither doors nor windows. When the wife and child were inside he bricked up the entrance, leaving only an opening for passing in food. Here the mother and child remained for six weeks, the husband going back and forth at the risk of his life to take them food. Sometimes he was unable to get to them for twenty-four hours together. The poor little child lived only a short time after they were able to leave the hiding place, being reduced about to starvation by the scanty supply of food.

MR. AND MRS. CHANG.

One of the young preachers of the London Mission, Mr. Chang, whose wife was a former bright schoolgirl, took his family to the Methodist Mission, when the Christians were flocking there from all parts of the city. Later, not thinking that a safe place, he took them back to his adopted father's and left them for a short time. While he was gone, the wife, little babe, and blind old mother were turned upon the streets by the landlords.

As Mrs. Chang moved slowly along, guiding the steps of the blind mother—not knowing where to go—a Boxer came along, seized her by the sleeve, and said, "Follow me." While they went along he had a Boxer trance. Throwing himself on the ground, he foamed and raved a short time, then rose, and pointing a stiff finger at her, said, "You ersh mao tzu! I will kill you!" He soon led her near a city gate, where there was a soldier guard of about 50 men and not far away several bodies of those who had been killed.

Mrs. Chang thought she was to be killed, and began praying for strength to bear witness for the Lord to the end. They began to question her. "Are you a Christian?" "I am." "Of what church?" "I am a Protestant." He then offered her a stick of incense, and said, "Burn this and your life will be spared." She replied firmly, "Never!" The crowd which had gathered began to shout, "Kill! Kill her, and see if her body rises again and goes to Jesus Christ." She turned to them and said, "My body cut into pieces will remain scattered on the ground like those others, but my spirit will escape you and rise to the Lord." The Boxer started off to get his knife. One of the soldiers called out, "You hateful Christian! You ought to die, but what would become of your child? Quick! Run for your life!"

She trembled so she could scarcely step, but ran as fast as was in her power, and, with the soldiers helping her, she escaped before the Boxer returned. Hidden away in a filthy corner, she passed the night. Toward morning a man came along with a lantern as if looking for some one. As he drew near, she saw it was her husband. He had been looking for her since noon of the day before. They got a cart and escaped to a village, where a friend bought safety by bribing the villagers not to report them. Later Mr. Chang went to the city to try to find his old mother, was arrested by the Boxers and murdered, and his head cut off and offered to the idol.

CHRISTIAN STUDENTS.

Wang Chih Shên was a student of the Methodist University, a senior. At the close of the school year he returned to his home at the East. He was well known as a Christian and was soon seized by the Boxers. They urged him to recant. He not only refused to do so, but bore testimony before his persecutors to his faith. They tried to make him stop, but he persisted in exhorting them and the crowd about him. They finally cut off his lips, then his tongue, and then cut him up limb from limb till he expired. Perhaps no case of greater bravery and greater suffering is known.

Another student when seized and asked, "Are you a Christian?" first replied, "What would you do with me if I were?" then said, "Yes; I am a Christian." They killed him on the spot.

Wu Hsi K'ou was a member of the junior class. He was taken near Shan Hai Kuan, where a heathen adopted him as a servant. He kept him safely through the stormy times and when the troops came gave him clothing and money and sent him away.

At Tsun Hua the keeper of a tea shop rescued one of the schoolboys, took him home as a son, cared for him through the time of danger, and later, when his uncle came searching for him, gave him up safely.

Wên Lan was a former pupil of the girl's school and was employed as teacher at Tsun Hua. When the church and school were scattered, she, with her grandmother and a few others, fled to the hills. For two days they had no food. At last they thought they might as well run the risk of being found by Boxers as of starving to death, so they gathered sticks and lighted a fire. The smoke betrayed their hiding place. The Boxers came and seized them.

In their company was a former student of the university who had been employed on the railroad and had grown cold in his faith. On the road Wên Lan began exhorting him in English to repent and make ready to die. He tried to stop her, as the Boxers would recognize them as Christians, but she said, "We shall tell them plainly we are Christians." She encouraged the little band to be faithful to death. When they were about to be executed she asked to be allowed to speak to the people. It was permitted, and she gave an earnest testimony of her faith, then said to her companions, "We shall soon be in heaven," then covered her head with a handkerchief and said, "Kill me now." She died after two blows of the knife.

Wang Ching Lin had studied medicine, then entered the regular university course. He was put to death in the city, and it was reported that his body was cut in six pieces.

One student helper was seized and urged to recant. He refused repeatedly. At last they prepared a vessel to receive his blood, made him kneel over it, and began carving on his neck slowly. His courage failed him and he consented to burn the one stick of incense, which saved his life.

Young P'u was a Christian servant who was with the missionaries, away from his family. His wife was seized by the Boxers and wounded with a knife. She was a fine-appearing woman and they evidently wanted to spare her life. They tried to persuade her to become the wife of one of the Boxers. She refused to do so. They then shaved her head and put on the garments of a Buddhist nun, but she refused to act in this character. At last, after vainly trying to make her recant, they decided that nothing was left to do but to kill her. She had two little children. As she was bound, the older child ran by her side carrying the younger, begging the Boxers to spare their mother. They killed the mother and the two children on the same spot.

MRS. MA.

During the early days of the outbreak a native catechist of the Anglican Church was killed, leaving a wife and two children. Mrs. Ma disguised herself, took her two children and hid away in a temple. She was seen by a friend of her husband, a Mr. Wei, who was very sorry for her helpless condition. Although he was not a church member, he was in danger from the Boxers because of friendly relations to foreigners. He had taken the precaution to obtain the good will of one of the Boxer leaders as a measure of self-protection. He went to this man and told of the death of Mr. Ma, begging that if the wife and children were brought to him he would save their lives, as only Mr. Ma himself was a Christian.

In a short time Mrs. Ma and her children were taken to the altar and she was questioned. "Are you a Christian?" "Yes—I am!" The Boxer leader was perplexed, and finally had her put into a prison. He wrote a letter to Mr. Wei, asking what it meant that he should have said she was not a Christian while she said she was. We do not know what further passed between them, but though Mrs. Ma remained true to her faith she was released in a few days and allowed to go unharmed.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHRISTIANS.

The refugee Christians of the Protestant Church bear witness to the faithful manner in which Catholics met death in many places.

Deacon Hêng said: "In one place I saw the death of a Catholic family. A mother and two children were bound and led away. A neighbor begged for the younger child and took it to keep, but the mother and older child were led away and cut to death. I heard her cry 'O Lord! O Lord! receive my soul!' That soul truly went to Heaven."

Wên Ts'ui, the young girl saved in Shansi, said that the Catholics were very brave. The children when led to death said, "You are bringing us great honor! This is our day of great joy!"

Deacon Li of T'ung Chou told of a Catholic hiding in disguise who when brought out and questioned confessed to being a Christian and died for his faith.

NOTES OF PERSECUTIONS OF CHRISTIANS IN K'AI P'ING CIRCUIT ENGLISH METHODIST MISSION.[a]

Li Fu, preacher at Ying Kê Chuang, seized by Boxers in Lan Chou district; burned on the back and shoulders in several places; stabbed in the stomach, fortunately not deep enough to cause death; the back of both heels cut with knives so that he will be lame as long as he lives; then bound with ropes so tightly that the marks remain upon his breast to-day, and conveyed to the yamen at Lan Chou. There his persecutors appealed to the magistrate to execute him, but, whether from fear or kindness, he refused to do so, throwing Li Fu into prison, faint and bleeding from his wounds. There he lay for about three months, cared for only by a fellow-prisoner, who washed his wounds and shared his food with him. Li Fu was only released from prison when Mr. Hinds returned to Tientsin in September and wrote to the Lan Chou magistrate. The poor fellow suffered so much in the hands of his tormentors that he pleaded with them to put him out of his misery at once, or even to bury him alive. His wife and children were also very badly treated. Mrs. Li had her clothes torn off her back, and with her husband was bound with ropes on a cart. One child, 4 years old, was caught by the feet and hurled across the court-yard like a log of wood. Another child received a bullet in her back, yet not a mortal wound. Li has since received a large sum of money as compensation for all his sufferings, but proposes to devote part of it to the building of a chapel or the support of a preacher in the district where he suffered.

Li Shu Chih, member at Yung P'ing Fu city chapel. He was caught by the rabble, headed by a wealthy Manchu, bound and carried to our own chapel, where a mock trial was held. Here he boldly avowed his Christianity, and, although appealed to several times, absolutely refused to recant. He was beaten with 500 stripes, then thrown into city prison, where, after about two months of awful sufferings, he passed away in the faith and hope of the Gospel.

Chang Shou Chên, preacher at Hsiao Chi, with his wife and seven other members of his family, burned alive in their home.

Chang Yu Wen, a lad 17 years old, very earnest member. Resisted so bravely all temptation to recant that his body was chopped in pieces, nailed to wall, and offered for sale at 500 taels per piece—an only child.

At Hê Chuang, thirty li from Yung P'ing Fu, twenty-three members and probationers were killed, most of whom had opportunity to recant. Prominent among those who died were:

Hê Ming Chang, one of the elders. His wife and little son also perished. Mr. Hê, with his wife and child, had escaped to the hills, but was pursued and recaptured. To all their offers he refused to listen and was burned alive. His wife and child were thrown from the precipice by the brother of Mrs. Hê, who afterwards descended and kicked mother and infant to death.

Yang Lin and wife, Yang Yi Ch'ing, wife and daughter; Yang Shou; Yang Chung, one family of seven. Captured together and carried to a temple. Kept there for some hours, but unanimously refusing to recant, they were murdered at midnight, their bodies being cut in pieces and flung apart.

Hsü Yang Hsi and daughter, sister and niece of above Yang Yi Ch'ing; neither of these had been baptized. Mrs. Hsü was a widow, 32 years of age. An uncle of her husband's had a grudge against her because she would not marry again, and himself led the Boxers to her home, where they wounded mother and daughter, and then drowned them in the River Lan. The uncle took possession of the property, but after the first visit of missionaries to Yung P'ing Fu, sent deeds, etc., to the preacher. The magistrate is dealing with this case and making disposition of the land.

Chên Hsi Kung, teacher at Pai Chia Tien Tze and a literary graduate. This man's courage and bearing so astonished his persecutors that after killing him they cut out his heart to see what had given him such fortitude. The heart was left for some days on a stone in the village.

Chên Jên Yi. This little fellow, only 10 years old, had been baptized as an infant. The child was caught and asked if he were a Christian, to which he replied that he was. Asked again if he would forsake Jesus, he refused most boldly and was cut down there and then. Two brothers and two nephews, although not baptized, died at the same time.

XXXVI.—FIRE AND SWORD AMONG THE SHANSI CHRISTIANS.

On the 19th of September a native Chinese helper named Wang Lan P'u arrived in Pekin, with a non-Christian acquaintance who had kindly come many hundred miles to see him safely through the disturbed districts. His story is of great interest, not only in itself, but for the incidental light which it sheds upon the modus in which the almost incredible fanaticism of the Boxers was introduced, took root, and bore its terrible fruits all within the space of a few days, and before anyone could have supposed such results possible. Mr. Wang's story is very similar to another, brought but two days before by Mr. Fei Ch'i Hao, a graduate in 1898 of the North China College of the American Board at T'ung Chou, who related with extreme circumstantiality the murder of most of the missionaries in the Tai Yuan Fu Valley.

With this introduction we will let Mr. Wang tell his own story, which was heard in detail by the writer three different times, on the last occasion full notes being taken and many details supplied. There was not only no attempt at embellishment, but his own sufferings and those of his family were dismissed in a very few sentences, as being too unimportant to be mentioned or too terrible to be dwelt upon.

"In the fourth moon (in May) there is held here a large fair which lasts fifteen days, where many horses and mules are sold and excellent theatrical exhibitions are given, thus attracting enormous crowds. At this fair the Boxer excitement was propagated, and an attack was planned upon the chapel of the China Inland Mission, which was only just completed.

"The local magistrate, knowing what was going on, went out himself and drove away the crowds threatening the attack, using a whip on them till they were dispersed. This happened twice, but the third time the mob was uncontrollable and the magistrate was himself beaten, his spectacles knocked off, and his sedan chair broken in pieces. This was on Sunday, and the missionaries were at the chapel for a service. They escaped to the roof and then took refuge in the house of a church member named Chou, who was a carpenter. The rioters followed and pulled the shop down, the magistrate losing his official hat in the scuffle. There was a military official there also, and between them they put the missionary (whose name was Larsson) and his companion (who had recently arrived and whose name I do not know) on a cart, the two magistrates having whips in their hands and riding outside the cart, one on each side, to protect the foreigners. The mob followed, throwing clumps of dirt and the like, and the curtains of the cart were torn in pieces.

"It was now noon, and when the missionaries arrived their clothes had all been torn to bits, but the magistrate gave them other clothes and took them into his yamen, saying that he would repay them for their losses. This official's surname was Juan (Rwan), from somewhere in the south of China. He had a kindness to Christianity because when he was a child he had been at a mission school, and he used often to come into our chapel and look about.

"The missionaries remained in the yamen two or three days. At first nobody cared for the foreigners, they were so occupied in looting the chapel, which was torn down to the foundations, everything being carried away. Elsewhere the chapels were all burned. The magistrate sent the missionaries on to Ying Chou in the night, as the mob kept coming to the yamen to try to get them. He lent them his own cart, with a military official for an escort, and two soldiers or runners. For the church members he hired a long cart, so that at Hun Yüan none were killed. At a later period, when they had returned, they were chased about the city and abused, being daubed with filth if they would not recant—but not one of them did so.

"Mr. Karlberg, with whom I worked, and myself remained at Ying Chou. On the 26th and 27th of the moon the people began to pray for rain, but the magistrate thought there would be no trouble in consequence. He required those that were going through the rain-praying ceremonies to register their names—that is, the leaders—so as to know whom to hold responsible. He sent for the literati and enjoined them to prevent any trouble. Soon the leaders of the Boxers arrived at Ying Chou, inviting cooperation in killing foreigners. Even the children began to learn and practice the drill, and the whole thing was brought to a head within about three days. The magistrate invited Mr. Karlberg and myself into the yamen, where we remained some days, but as we went in the night not many knew that we were there, and there was no external disturbance. Mr. Karlberg rode on horseback and reached So P'ing in less than two days, escorted by men sent from the yamen, and there was no trouble anywhere.

"On the 1st day of the sixth moon things became so bad that the magistrate wanted me also to get away. He told me to put on the dress of a yamen courier, gave me one of the yamen horses, and wrote a dispatch to the prefect at So P'ing telling the conditions of things. As bearer of an official letter I should be much safer, though I was well known all along the road. I also took dispatches to the magistrate at Tso Wei Hsien, the first county town, where I arrived at dark. I went at once to the yamen, just in time to see the chapel there set on fire by a mob. The church members saw me in the yamen, and none of them had then been injured. I only spent a part of the night there, as it was unsafe, and started very early the next morning, getting 20 li before daylight, escorted by yamen men.

"By the middle of the forenoon I was in So P'ing Fu, where I went direct to the yamen with the horse and to deliver the dispatches, and then to the mission headquarters to tell the news. Everything was still quiet there. Four of us went to see the magistrate. The magistrate went over to see the prefect when we applied to him, and the latter said, 'Do whatever you like about it,' meaning that he did not care. He is one of the Manchus, who all violently hated Christians, not for any particular reason, only they had a devil inside which made them do so. After this the magistrate had no plan of his own. He was asked for an escort to Kalgan, and promised to furnish one to the boundaries of his own country. He ordered five or six carts, for which the price was agreed, and he paid it through the yamen men.

"We returned to the chapel much pleased that there appeared a way of escape, and were busy getting ready when a mob gathered. In a trice the door was forced and looting began. We saw that things were hopeless and again fled to the yamen, the magistrate giving us one small room for all the missionaries, and another for the Christians, and they were outside not inside rooms. His treatment was very perfunctory and boded us no good. At this time the crowd had not become savage. They were fully occupied in looting the premises. By noon we had reached the yamen, and the house was soon after burned.

"It was ingeniously proposed to represent to the people that I had come to the city with imperial orders just in from Peking, requiring all foreigners to be sent there in manacles. In this way the lives of the prisoners could be saved from the mob, and when we were clear of the city and of danger it would be easy to remove the fetters. To this the missionaries agreed as a shrewd device. A blacksmith was called, who made six pairs of handcuffs, one for each of the men. As I had the yamen horse to take back and my own family to look after it was thought best that I should return to Ying Chou. I remained in the stable court of the yamen. During this whole day the missionaries were too excited to eat, and when they reached the yamen no one offered them anything, not even a drink. After I had been asleep some time, being very much exhausted, I was loudly called out by name, and everyone saw that mischief was meant. I could not escape, so I went out and found a great crowd of Boxers and Manchus, who began to beat me terribly and dragged me off to the still burning chapel to throw me into the fire.

"It was not long before I lost consciousness entirely, being half dead and supposed to be entirely so. I learned afterwards that the Boxers felt me to see if I was really dead, and thinking that I was, they did not care to drag me the rest of the way simply for the trouble of throwing me into the fire. Besides, two men were standing by who befriended me by using a great deal of conciliatory language to the Boxers, begging them to let me die where I was. One of them was from a village near by, the other a sort of local bully in the city who had often seen me in the street chapel. He was fond of the doctrine, only he could never make up his mind to repent. They felt my heart and pulse, saw that I had no mortal wound, and waited by for me to revive, which the night-chill helped me do. The mob meantime had left me to go back to the yamen and try to drag the missionaries out to kill them. There were ten or more Christians there, whom they beat severely. Some of them probably were killed, but they did not get at the missionaries.

"My benefactors helped me up and took me back to the yamen, and wanted to lay me inside where I had been before, but the yamen men would not admit me on any terms. 'Suppose he should die here, who would be supposed to have killed him?' But they gave the two men my horse, clothes, bedding, cash bag, and my dispatch, and while one of them led my horse the other one carried me on his back outside the city. Between them they helped me on the horse, though I was so weak and faint that unless supported by one while the other led the animal I could not have sat on him. They went with me all the way to an inn, where we happened to meet the cook of the missionary family. We dared not stay there, so they soon all helped me on the horse again.

"The cook returned to his home in Fên Chou Fu, and the man from the city went with me all the way to the end of the first day's journey. On the way, at a town 40 li from the city, I met travelers who told me that that morning thirteen foreigners had been killed near So P'ing Fu. I heard this at two different times, and am sure it is true. They were probably manacled, and could make no resistance. I gave the men who escorted me some clothes for their kindness, as I had no money. In my feeble condition I was three days in getting to Ying Chou.

"When at a town 40 li away from there I was told that it was useless to go back, as the place had been destroyed on the third of the sixth moon (June 29). I heard also that my mother and others had been sent by the magistrate in a cart to So P'ing Fu, but that she had been overtaken by the Boxers half a day's journey distant, brought back, and herself, with my brother, sister, my little child, and an old lady named Wu (my wife had died in the second moon) buried alive. Not only this, but the head yamen runner who had escorted them was also thrown into the fire, the cart burned, the mule killed and thrown into the flames, as well as the dog and chickens of the yard I lived in. People were not tied, but just thrown into the fire loose and driven back whenever they tried to get out. It was a slow and a bitter death, which I do not like to think of.

"All the church members were captured at the same time, except my brother who used to do a little trade and sell Christian books on his own account, and was away from home at the time. The magistrate was informed of these events, and did his best to save the life of his own yamen servants, but was told that if he pressed the matter he himself would be thrown into the fire, too.

"Notwithstanding these dreadful stories, I could not give up the idea of returning to see for myself if this was true—and there was the horse to be taken to the yamen. So I went on by myself. About 10 li from the city a band of forty or more Boxers set on me, and recognizing me with glee, ordered me to get off the horse, tied me tightly and dragged me on to the city. They called their head master of Boxers, who happened to be a tinker, whose occupation was mending iron kettles. He could not even read, but now he was a 'head master.' The magistrate soon had my arrival reported to him, and heard that the head master was trying the case. The magistrate sent a polite invitation to the head master to come to him, which he did.

"Then the magistrate said that he had all along felt grave doubts whether these were true Boxers, and whether they could, as pretended, keep out arrows and bullets. He now proposed to test this. 'Let your men go through their spells, make themselves invulnerable if they can, and I will attack them with guns. If you are not hurt, you may kill the courier Wang in any way you like; you are true Boxers and I will be one too; otherwise I shall know that you are not the true Boxers, and your claim is a fraud.' The headmaster had the Boxers from one village or region only with him, but he thought it over, and as it seemed a fair proposition he assented, but wished himself not to be in the ranks but to one side, so that he could tell when the spirits had really arrived. He also insisted that the test should not begin until he announced that the spirits had arrived. To this the magistrate agreed.

"By this time it was late at night—nearly midnight—but, the story having got out, the whole city was there with torches and lanterns to see the spectacle. There was a Chên Wu Temple on the city wall, and in front of that the Boxers were drawn up making their passes in the air and otherwise practicing for the trial.

"Most of the many onlookers were below the wall in a good position to see. The four yamen men that the magistrate had appointed to guard me wanted to see and loosed me, so that we could all look on together. The magistrate had given careful directions and looked after the loading of the guns himself with balls as well as powder. Foreseeing that there was to be trouble he had engaged two hundred experts who could fight, wrestle, and shoot, to be his guards, and it was these men that he set against the Boxers. They waited until the head master cried 'Shên lai la' (the spirits have come), when the magistrate, who had a gun himself, gave the order 'K'ai ch'iang' (open fire). Four or five of the Boxers were killed outright, six or seven were hurt so that they fell over the city wall, and not a single man among them was without a wound. Then they all scattered.

"The magistrate now summoned me and told me how he had been unable to protect his own yamen headman, and that it was not safe for me to remain. He gave me 20 ounces of silver and some brass cash, together with an official letter which I was to take to T'ai Yuan Fu (where I expected to go), mainly as a protection to me in traveling. Although very unfit to ride a horse or even to move at all, I went away that night. We then knew nothing about the attitude of the governor toward the missionaries, or I should never have thought of going in that direction.

"After about 30 li I got into serious trouble. There was a crowd at a large village who suspected me, and were sure that I was a follower of foreigners. They accused me of having little figures of men cut out of yellow paper, and foreign bewildering medicines about me, and searched me to see. In this way they found my silver, and also the official letter. It was nothing but the latter that saved my life. Then the crowd was divided, some crying: 'Kill him, anyway, and be done with him;' while the rest said: 'He is a courier, let him go on his official route; it is none of our business.' In this way they wrangled for a whole half day, and some well-intentioned people spoke a good word for me. In almost every mob there are some of this kind; not all are the very worst.

"I learned afterwards, what I did not then suspect, that there was a little party who privately agreed that it was best to let me go, and then they would pursue me on their own account, rob and kill me, and divide the silver among them. I went on as far as I could, and had got 7 or 8 li when some men came running after me, crying out that I must leave the big road and take a byway, for there was a band of men just behind intending to chase and kill me, who were armed with swords and guns. This perplexed me very much, and I was not sure but this was a plot to kill me. They were very urgent, so I yielded, and left the road where there was a pass in front and a mountain near. It was not a cart load, but for pack mules only. I came to a village and begged them to let me rest there for a time, but they would have nothing to do with me.

"But at another small village an old man was kind to me, and advised me against going to T'ai Yuan Fu, which was 800 or 900 li, while it was only 600 or so to Pao Ting Fu, the capital of Chihli. Here I stayed for three days until the pursuers would have all gone back, and then I made a detour around the mountain and regained the main road. After this I went to Wu T'ai Hsien, where the famous mountain is, escorted by a man who was sent by my village friends, with whom I had to share my silver, so that I had very little left. Beyond this, at a place called Tai Ving, I met the Boxers again, and was once more examined. Here I told a different story from the former one, and said I was a trader returning home. I had torn up the official document which would now have implicated me. Not to have told different stories at different times would have been impossible; there was really no help for it. Finding that Boxers were worse and worse the further on I went, I resolved to turn back into the mountains again, 120 li to a city named Fu P'ing. I did not then know the characters, but as 'Fu' means happiness and 'P'ing' peace, I thought the Lord was opening a way to both, and though the first character was wrong, I did get relief. I told my story to the innkeeper, and he advised me to do a little trading with what small funds I had left.

"There was a neighbor of his who knew how to make twisted doughnuts fried in oil, and I got to know him, gave all my things to him as security, and did a small business in this way with him for more than two months. There were no Boxers at all in that place. When it came to the 8th moon I thought I might go on. In that time I had cleared a string and a half of cash, and bought a good many things besides. I had no adventures on the way to Pao Ting Fu, and there I heard that all the foreign buildings had been burned and many church members killed. I did not hear of the murder of any foreigners there. On the way to Pekin the Sikh soldiers took away the money of myself and the man who came down with me. It is a great joy to me to see so many Christians together again, and to tell and to hear of the Lord's mercies."[a]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests to Senators that amendments which have been offered and printed are on the table, and no order has been preserved in regard to offering them, therefore each Senator who has an amendment to offer should offer it from the floor.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 9, on page 5, after line 21, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. —. That in addition to the persons China and the United States have, by the convention of December 8, 1894, agreed shall be permitted to come to the United States, namely, "officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure, but not laborers," there may be permitted to come to the United States not to exceed five good-faith representatives of each regularly established Chinese wholesale commercial house.

To establish that he is such good-faith representative, a Chinese person must comply with the following provisions, and failure to comply with all or any of them shall deprive him of the privilege of entering or remaining in the United States:

First. He shall obtain a certificate and have it viséed, as in the case of a Chinese merchant coming to the United States for the first time, except that the certificate shall show, and the diplomatic or consular representative's investigation shall confirm, that the applicant is in truth the commercial representative of a Chinese wholesale commercial house and seeks admission to the United States solely in promotion of commerce and not to engage as a laborer, and that the said house is not directly or indirectly maintained to issue credentials to agents in order to evade this act.

Second. He shall, on applying for admission to the United States, be subject to the same requirements as are by this act and the Treasury rules thereunder imposed on a Chinese merchant coming to the United States for the first time.

Third. He shall comply with such rules and regulations relating to persons of his class as may be made by the Commissioner-General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That he shall be deported from the United States, should he while there cease to be such good-faith representative of the commercial house so sending him to the United States: And provided further, That the Commissioner-General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may suspend or modify the operations of this section whenever in his judgment the privilege granted by it is abused.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I deem it necessary, if the pending bill is to pass, that this amendment be adopted also. The Senate is well aware from what has been stated already that the restrictions concerning the coming of merchants from China are very severe. Just at this particular period, when we are so anxious to reach the markets of China, it seems a strange thing that the purchasing agents of wholesale houses in China should not have the right to come to America and look over our products as well as our markets, and so arrange for an interchange of business.

This matter was discussed in committee. I think I am warranted in saying that there was a general feeling that if it could be done some such provision should be made. I am not the author of the amendment I have offered. It was drawn by the representative of the California convention, who is also the author of this bill. It was presented to the committee as a solution of this question. It appears in parallel columns in the record before you at page 156. But later on the author of it begged leave to withdraw it, he not being willing to be responsible for it because of the expressed fear on the part of those who were interested in federated labor that by reason of this amendment laborers might seek entrance into our country. I know of no other objection which has been offered by anyone, and this objection seems to me to be so small and so trivial and the danger to our prosperity as a country so small, and on the other hand the advantages of having the amendment adopted so great, that I sincerely hope the Senate will give it proper consideration and adopt it as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, as to the amendment which has just been proposed, there is one clause in it which we have no right to enact, and that is the clause which authorizes the Commissioner of Immigration to modify or change or repeal that provision. The Congress can not delegate to anybody the right to change its laws in any way. Now, we do delegate to various officers, principally Cabinet officers, the right to make rules and regulations to carry into effect the laws which we enact, but this amendment expressly authorizes the Commissioner to suspend it, to repeal it, and that we have no authority to do. It has been so expressly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the reciprocity case.

The provision to which I have referred may be cured by amendment, but as I intend to vote against the amendment as a whole I do not choose to propose an amendment.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, in speaking to the other amendment, I did not finish what I had to say upon the subject of the danger of offending China. I think there is great danger of doing so if this bill becomes a law. I think, especially under the circumstances, that the agents of Russia and of England would be able to persuade the Chinese Empire, with such an insult put upon it, to sever diplomatic relations with the United States.

I wish to submit the question, Who is the better friend of the wage-earner, of the laboring man—one who would preserve to the American people the right of exclusion while maintaining friendly relations with China, or the one who would pass this bill and give offense to China? In fifty years, I think, from the estimates made, we can look to a trade with China of $200,000,000 per annum. This would employ 500,000 people in the United States. If we should lose this trade by reason of unjust legislation, what will be the result? We will deprive the 500,000 laborers in the United States of employment in supplying this trade.

I hold that the man who would secure the employment of 500,000 of his countrymen is a better friend of labor than the man who would throw it away for a sentiment. But what section is most interested in keeping the trade of China? The South. And why should the South put this trade in peril? Because it is sought to make the question partisan. The interests of the South are endangered by this bill. I wish to submit some statistics bearing upon the point of our growing cotton trade with China.

During the year 1890, just preceding the Boxer trouble and before the exports to China from this country were shut off, within the single month of July there were exported to China 15,519,945 yards of domestic cottons, valued at $871,000, but within less than ninety days after the trouble began this export demand dwindled down to 390,000 yards, valued at only $25,375, and still kept down to this nominal figure until July, 1901, when the reaction came, and, the markets of China having been thrown open, the exports for the single month of July of that year aggregated 33,988,783 yards, valued at $1,709,605.

It lingered around these figures from that time on until it crawled up in January, 1902, to the very encouraging figures of 37,672,467 yards, valued at $1,773,585. It is estimated that for the current fiscal year our exports and manufactured cotton will probably exceed in value $30,000,000.

Mr. President, I do not want to put this trade in peril. I do not want to see the South take this risk, and therefore I am opposed to this bill, when it will do no good in my judgment. This bill will not operate to exclude Chinese any more than the Geary Act or the Platt amendment, and therefore it is the part of wisdom to maintain our friendly relations and exclude the Chinese, as we have been doing, and save the chances of losing our trade.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] is not more averse to giving any just cause of offense to the Chinese Government in the passage of this bill than are others of us who, like himself, are from the South. We look forward with great hope to the development of the trade with the Chinese, and we are confident it will be so developed so long as we can, in a proper way, make the goods which they desire and sell those goods to them at prices which will be advantageous. I think commercial relations should be kept up, and while I shall support the bill of the committee, I wish to say that as it was originally drawn it contained some features extremely objectionable to me, not so much because of their practical operation as because I thought they might give offense to the Chinese people.

There is no time now at my command, however, to elaborate that. I simply rose to say that I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, with the modification which I understand he proposes to make in pursuance of the suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS], taking out the last clause of the amendment. I think it is an important thing, and that this amendment is as distinct a notification to the Chinese Government as we could give that we do desire friendly commercial relations with them. It is practically an invitation to them that their merchants shall send their representatives here for the purpose of examining into and buying the products of this country. I believe the adoption of this amendment will go very far toward relieving the bill from any apparent intention to make difficult commercial relations between China and this country.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I believe there is force in the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama, and I ask leave to withdraw all of the amendment after the word "States," in line 25 on page 2. In other words, strike out the words:

[a] NOTE.—The following are the names of the missionaries murdered at So P'ing Fu, so far as known:

Of the Swedish Union, Mr. and Mrs. S. A. Persson, Mr. N. Carleson, Mr. O. A. L. Larsson, Mr. G. E. Karlberg, Miss J. Lundell, Miss J. Engvall, Miss M. Hedlund, Miss A. Johannsson. Of the Christian and Missionary Alliance, Mr. and Mrs. C. Blomberg and child.

And provided further, That the Commissioner-General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may suspend or modify the operations of this section whenever in his judgment the privilege granted by it is abused.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont desires to modify his amendment by striking out certain words, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In clause 3 on page 2 it is proposed to strike out:

And provided further, That the Commissioner-General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may suspend or modify the operations of this section whenever in his judgment the privilege granted by it is abused.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if this amendment is adopted, it will simply open the door for a great number of Chinamen to get into the United States under a pretended commission from some trading house. The trade between the United States and China has not been carried on by this method. It never has been, not even when they were free to come here. It never will be. I suppose the Treasury Department can go to work and keep these people out, as they have kept out the others, but in my judgment it is a pernicious and vicious amendment and one which ought not to be put on this bill if the bill is to be a practical bill; and I do not know whether it is or not. But if it is to be a practical bill and is to be administered with success, the amendment is one of the things which would make it very difficult, if not quite impossible, to administer it properly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I am very sorry to differ with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I can not believe that he thoroughly comprehends the possibilities of the evasion of our exclusion law under an amendment such as this. As was well said by my colleague, China does not trade in that way. It does not send drummers or agents to Great Britain or France or Germany or the United States for the purpose of laying in stocks of foreign goods.

Then, again, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are somewhere between 400,000,000 and 600,000,000 Chinese. How many mercantile establishments are there in a country with such a vast population? While within the coming ten years there would not probably be ten commercial houses or five commercial houses in China sending bona fide agents to the United States for the purpose of purchasing American goods, it is not at all unlikely that there would be 10,000 apparently Chinese mercantile houses sending five representatives from each house to the United States.

It would be the most profitable business in China for commercial houses of great and small degree to make arrangements with the Six Chinese Companies by which for a good-sized sum they and each of them would name five representatives to come to the United States under the guise of drummers or as agents.

This amendment is outside of the treaty. The Treasury officials will give testimony that they have had more trouble in keeping out laborers under the clause which admits merchants than under any other clause in the treaty or in the statute based upon the treaty. This is a proposition which China herself has not asked, way outside the treaty, and it seems to me we might well wait until the present treaty has ceased to exist before we open new doors for the admission of Chinese laborers into the United States.

I have no doubt but that if this clause is adopted—and I fear it will be under the mistaken idea that the commerce of the United States will be improved by it—it will bear bitter fruit, to be partaken of by the laborers of the United States. We may well exclaim, "Oh, Commerce, what crimes are committed in thy name!" Nowadays whenever some legislation is sought which is inimical to the real interests of the mass of the people of this country the cry is immediately raised, "The demands of our commerce!" "The demands of commerce with China require that it shall be done." Mr. President, you are simply opening the doors of the United States, with an amendment such as this, to hundreds of thousands of Chinese laborers under the guise of agents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I desire to say a very few words in response to the remarks of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] in regard to the South. I think the people of the South would be glad, by all legitimate and proper means, to open the markets and secure a place for additional quantities of their cotton and their cotton goods. To that end, I hope, however, that they do not want their representatives to resort to any means which are not proper or which would work great injustice or injury to other sections of this Republic.

The people of the South know something of race difficulties and the trouble in dealing with a people of a different color and a different race; and I for one am not willing to vote to let down the bars, thereby creating a gate which will admit thousands and hundreds of thousands of Chinese laborers and precipitate them upon the Pacific coast to compete with the laborers of this country. We have race difficulties of our own, and we do not want to add to them by the indiscriminate admission of Chinese laborers into this country.

I repeat that with all legitimate means to extend our trade and our commerce I am in hearty sympathy, but I am not in favor of resorting to wrong and injustice in order to bring it about. Already the efforts of the manufacturers of this country to secure the trade of China by unjust and unfair means have cost the Government the lives of more than 10,000 of its citizens and more than $500,000,000 of its money. In the vain hope that commercially it might add something additional I am not willing to vote for a measure which will open this country to the indiscriminate influx of Chinese laborers. I believe that this amendment is the entering wedge by which hereafter there will be permitted to come Chinese of all classes—laborers and every other kind.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, after line 21, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. —. That in addition to the persons China and the United States have, by the convention of December 8, 1894, agreed shall be permitted to come to the United States, namely, "officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure, but not laborers," there may be permitted to come to the United States not to exceed five good-faith representatives of each regularly established Chinese wholesale commercial house.

To establish that he is such good-faith representative, a Chinese person must comply with the following provisions, and failure to comply with all or any of them shall deprive him of the privilege of entering or remaining in the United States:

First. He shall obtain a certificate and have it viséed, as in the case of a Chinese merchant coming to the United States for the first time, except that the certificate shall show, and the diplomatic or consular representative's investigation shall confirm, that the applicant is in truth the commercial representative of a Chinese wholesale commercial house and seeks admission to the United States solely in promotion of commerce and not to engage as a laborer, and that the said house is not directly or indirectly maintained to issue credentials to agents in order to evade this act.

Second. He shall, on applying for admission to the United States, be subject to the same requirements as are by this act and the Treasury rules thereunder imposed on a Chinese merchant coming to the United States for the first time.

Third. He shall comply with such rules and regulations relating to persons of his class as may be made by the Commissioner-General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That he shall be deported from the United States should he while there cease to be such good-faith representative of the commercial house so sending him to the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont if he has any knowledge as to how many wholesale commercial houses there are in China and how many persons might come under the provisions of this amendment?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have not.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, this amendment was carefully considered in committee. The testimony showed that Chinese mercantile establishments do not have drummers and agents of this character; that their business as transacted in this country does not require the amendment. It would let down the bars in a class of cases where most the frauds are permitted, namely, the admission to the country of laborers under the guise of merchants. If this amendment passes, it pratically takes all effectiveness out of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

Mr. TELLER. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEITFELD (when Mr. DUBOIS'S name was called). I again announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. DUBOIS] with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I should like to inquire if the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, however, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to ask if the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am paired with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN (after having voted in the negative). Has the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed he has not.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Being paired with that Senator, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. DOLLIVER (after having voted in the negative). I desire to inquire whether the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If that is the case, I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. I will say to the Senator from Iowa, that if my colleague were here he would vote "nay."

Mr. DOLLIVER. Then I desire to have my vote remain as it is, recorded in the negative.

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 57; as follows:

YEAS—13.

Bacon,	Frye,	McLaurin, S. C.	Vest.
Burnham,	Hale,	Morgan,
Clay,	McComas,	Proctor,

So Mr. DILLINGHAM'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let it be read. I can offer it, and then, I suppose, if there are other amendments to be offered to the bill my amendment will have to lie on the table until the text of the bill is perfected.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it be read.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I suppose I can offer it at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That all laws now in force prohibiting and regulating the coming of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent into the United States, and the residence of such persons therein, be, and the same are hereby, extended and continued, including the act entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States," approved September 13, 1888, so far as the same is not inconsistent with treaty obligations now existing, in full force and effect until the 7th day of December, 1904, and so long as the treaty between China and the United States concluded on the 17th day of March, 1894, and proclaimed by the President on the 8th day of December, 1894, shall continue in force; and said laws shall apply to all territory under the jurisdiction of the United States, and to all immigration of Chinese laborers from the island to the mainland territory of the United States, or from one portion of the island territory of the United States to another portion of said island territory: Provided, however, That this shall not apply to the transit of Chinese laborers from one island to another island of the same group, or to any islands within the jurisdiction of any State or of the District of Alaska.

SEC. 2. That in case said treaty be terminated, as provided in Article VI thereof, this act and the acts hereby extended and continued shall remain in force until there shall be concluded between the United States and China a new treaty respecting the coming of Chinese persons into the United States, and until appropriate laws shall be passed to carry into effect the provisions thereof.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered to make and prescribe, and from time to time to change, such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and proper to execute the provisions of this act and of the acts hereby extended and continued, and of said treaty of December 8, 1894, and with the approval of the President to appoint such agents as he may deem necessary for the efficient execution of said treaty and said acts.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I ask may be read.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Would it not be better to perfect the bill before the amendment is perfected? It seems to me that that is the proper parliamentary course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The original bill or the proposed substitute, either one, is open to amendment at any time.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. My point is that an amendment to the original bill, to perfect it, is first in order. After it is perfected, then of course amendments to the substitute are in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule provides that "motions to amend the part to be stricken out are first in order."

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Yesterday the Senate struck out sections 6 and 7, the student and teacher clauses. That makes necessary an amendment in line 24 on page 19. The word "sections" should be singular, the words "six, seven," having been stricken out.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, line 24, strike out "sections" and insert "section," and strike out the words "six, seven, and;" so as to read: "section 8."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Now it will be necessary to change the word "eight" to "six," which will correspond with the renumbering of the bill. Sections 6 and 7 were dropped out by the amendment yesterday and section 8 will become section 6. Therefore, in line 24, page 19, I move that the word "eight" be stricken out and the word "six" inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The word "and" will have to be stricken out too.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Yes, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask the Senator from Indiana if it would not be well to amend all the numbers of sections so as to make them correspond in their proper sequence. Why not just change the whole thing? It will all have to be done sooner or later.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. They will have to be renumbered.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why not just move that they all be renumbered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerks attend to the renumbering of sections without any instruction.

Mr. ALLISON. Not where the sections are named in the text.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is in the text.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I move that the sections be renumbered after section 5.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think it would do to authorize the clerks to change those sections. They can renumber the sections consecutively, but where sections are carried in the body of the text I think the Senate itself must deal with the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not at all what the Chair intended to be understood as saying.

Mr. ALLISON. So I understood; but I think the Senator from Indiana had an idea that the clerks could change the number of sections in the text of the bill, which I do not think they can.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. No; the Senator from Indiana did not intend to be so understood, but, as the Senator will observe, on page 3 there is section 5 and the next section is section 8, sections 6 and 7 having been stricken out by order of the Senate yesterday. It will be necessary to renumber the sections after section 5 in consecutive order, and I move that that be done.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Indiana, then, what becomes of the word "eight," in line 24, on page 19?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I move that that be stricken out and the word "six" inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. Has the word "and" also been stricken out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been stricken out.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. On page 34, line 13, I move that the word "less" be stricken out and the word "more" inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana offers an amendment which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, line 13, strike out the word "less" at the end of the line and insert in lieu thereof the word "more;" so as to read "for a term not more than one year."

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask the Senator from Indiana why he offers that amendment.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I think the Senator will find upon an examination of statutes that it is not usual to provide that imprisonment shall be not less than a certain period. That leaves the court open to impose a punishment by imprisonment of one hundred years, if it likes, and Congress ought to fix the maximum period for which the person should be imprisoned.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator does not want to go from one extreme to the other. Under the section as he proposes it, the highest punishment, no matter how grave the offense or how much at stake, would be one year.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. No; I am going to move an amendment after this is adopted, so as to read "and for a term not more than five years."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, line 14, strike out the words "one year" and insert "five years."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut, How does it read now?

The Secretary read as follows:

Or by imprisonment for a term not more than five years.

Mr, FAIRBANKS. On page 48, in line 21, I offer a similar amendment. I move to strike out the word "less" and insert "more;" also to strike out "one year" and insert "five years."

The SECRETARY. On page 48, line 21, strike out "less," the first word in the line, and insert "more;" and in the same line strike out "one year" and insert "five years."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The Senator from Connecticut has called my attention to the necessity of a similar amendment in line 1, at the top of page 32.

The SECRETARY. On page 32, line 1, strike out "less" and insert "more;" and in the same line strike out "one year" and insert "five years."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. My attention has been called to another amendment. On page 34, line 9, it will be necessary to change the numbers of the sections to correspond with the bill as it will be renumbered. I move that the word "twenty-seven" be stricken out and "twenty-five" be inserted, and that the word "twenty-eight" be striken out and "twenty-six" be inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to inquire whether an amendment was made on page 33, line 17? Was that amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; that has not been amended.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. On page 33, line 17, is a clause the same as those which were amended.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I move, in line 17, page 33, that the word "less" be stricken out and the word "more" be inserted; and, in the same line, that the words "one year" be stricken out and "five years" be inserted; so as to read:

Or by imprisonment for a term not more than five years.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to come in at the conclusion of the bill, after the proviso in the last section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add to the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to exclude Chinese Christians or Chinese who assisted in the defense or relief of the foreign legations or the Pe-tang Cathedral, in the city of Pekin, in the year 1900. But the same may be admitted upon proper ecclesiastical and consular certificates under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. QUAY. That amendment, Mr. President, is divisible, and I will ask for a division of the question. I propose to take the yeas and nays on each division, if the Senate will permit me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair it is not divisible. The second clause, left by itself, could not stand.

Mr. QUAY. I think it would. Will the Secretary have the kindness to read the first clause of the amendment?

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to exclude Chinese Christians or Chinese who assisted in the defense or relief of the foreign legations or the Pe-tang Cathedral, in the city of Pekin, in the year 1900.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That clearly would stand by itself. Now the second clause will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

But the same may be admitted upon proper ecclesiastical and consular certificates under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. QUAY. I propose to take the question first as to Chinese Christians, and secondly as to Chinese soldiers who fought for us in the defense of the legations. It seems to me that the question is divisible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be compelled to rule that that division can not be made.

Mr. QUAY. Which one?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The one which the Senator has just referred to as taking the question on Chinese Christians and then on the Chinese soldiers.

Mr. QUAY. There are two different classes of persons described in the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That may be.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator to strike out "soldiers."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can easily offer an amendment.

Mr. QUAY. Then I will strike out the lines relating to Chinese soldiers.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he strike out the words "ecclesiastical and." It is very awkward to introduce into our legislation the recognition of ecclesiastical authority and it gives rise to very vexatious questions as to what are ecclesiastical authorities. If he says "upon proper consular certificates under regulations to be prescribed," it would be safe enough.

Mr. QUAY. I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts. The only object in inserting the word "ecclesiastical" was to verify the character of the Christians by having the certificate of the clerical authority, but the Secretary of the Treasury, if the amendment should pass, of course can make that regulation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania modifies his amendment by striking out the words "ecclesiastical and," and also by striking out, as the Chair understood the Senator, the words "Chinese who assisted in the defense or relief of the foreign legations."

Mr. QUAY. Yes, sir.

Now, Mr. President, the objections to the adoption of my amendment when it was introduced some days ago, as I understood them, were as to the character of the immigrants excepted, which Senators, who alluded rather derisively to the amendment, indicated in their judgment did not vary from that of the population of the slums in San Francisco, existing there because the authorities of San Francisco, to my mind, do not properly police the city.

The chapter which has been read to the Senate from the Secretary's desk has sufficiently indicated the character of that Christian population. There remained another objection, to wit, that the Chinese would rush to the banner of the Cross all Chinese turning Christians, and no one could answer for the number that would swarm under that provision to our shores.

Well, Mr. President, if you place in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury the authority to investigate the character of those Chinese and lodge similar authority in our own officials of the consular service upon the other side of the water, it seems that difficulty can be provided for. It may be that some of the Chinese will come as hypocrites. That can not be avoided. God only can look into a man's heart, and many of them may arrive in this country, and probably many white men exist in this country now who, like the fool, will say in their hearts, "There is no God," but who believe that everything exists as the effect of causation without a cause, as the creation of a law without a lawmaker. In that they would not differ from very many good citizens of the United States to-day, but if they join the church of a Christian denomination they must conform to its usages and whether in earnest or not, whether it is for the benefit of their souls or not, their temporal conduct will be provided for, and in such manner as that it will not affect the well-being of society.

I regard, although I do not profess to be an apostle, the Christian religion the basic stone, the living root of all Western civilization and government and society. The people who conform to its ideas, whether sincere or not, I recognize as fit to take part in this Government, at least to live in this country. So I would admit Chinese hypocrites if they fulfill the requirements of the ecclesiastical authorities.

Now, I believe I will take a vote on that amendment and I will offer a second one, and I have something to say on that.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, if I voted merely from sentiment I should vote for this amendment, but as I propose to vote against it I desire to state the ground of my vote.

The United States has adopted the policy of the exclusion of Chinese laborers. With that policy I find no fault. Indeed, I sustain it, and nothing I have said or done in this debate has been intended in any way to relax the policy of the exclusion of Chinese laborers from this country.

I do not see how it is possible to admit Chinese because they are Christians and not overturn our policy of excluding Chinese laborers. I do not know that we can admit a Christian laborer any more properly than we can a Chinese laborer who is not a Christian. So, while from sentiment I should be inclined to vote for this amendment, I am forced to give my vote against it.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, this, to my mind, is rather a strange proposition. It proposes to give to Chinese who possess a given religion the right to come in, which might involve an inquiry as to who are Christians and who are not Christians, and what denomination can be properly classed within that designation. It involves the further question——

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RAWLINS. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. The common acceptation of the word "Christian" is one who believes that Christ is the Son of God.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, the first amendment of the Constitution of the United States forbids Congress to make any law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. According to the spirit of the Constitution, as I understand the idea of religious liberty as embodied therein, Congress has no function and has no right to discriminate in favor of a Christian or against a Christian, in favor of a Mohammedan or against a Mohammedan, in favor of the followers of Confucius or against those of other religious denominations. It is a queer idea, it seems to me, to inject into this bill a sort of inquisition to ascertain what may or may not be the religious faith of a person knocking at the doors of the Republic for admission into this American household, where all people are supposed to stand upon a footing of equality, absolutely beyond the power of the Government, so far as being subjected to any imposition or any disparagement or disqualification on account of religious sentiment.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, this is rather a sentimental proposition, and to one who reads it superficially there might be something alluring in it. I do not intend to vote for it. I have been in favor of observing our treaty obligations with China. I do not want to see them sifted away, as has been in some legislation attempted. If we come to abrogate the treaty, I am in favor of doing it in a manly and open way. While I am in favor of standing by and maintaining the good faith of the United States in relation to it, I am unable to discover any reason why we should by statute enlarge it, which the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania would do. My fear about it is that the Senator from Pennsylvania would suddenly become the most successful Chinese missionary in the world——

Mr. QUAY. I so suggested.

Mr. SPOONER. And that great numbers who wish to come to the United States might suddenly become Christians; and when asked, "How did you happen to become a Christian," they could truthfully say, "Senator QUAY persuaded me to become a Christian"—not "almost," but absolutely. How long they would be Christians after they reached this country, how soon they would backslide from the Senator's standpoint of Christianity and go back to the doctrines of Confucius would be purely a mental operation which the Senator from Pennsylvania would not be able, nor would the Government inspectors, to detect.

The adoption of this amendment would simply open the door to every Chinaman who professed Christianity, and that is easily professed. Many men profess it and do not possess it even in our own country, and I think it might very easily happen that many Chinamen would profess it for the purpose of getting into the United States as laborers who do not possess it in China or would not possess it in this country. It would open the gateway wider, I believe, to the admission of Chinese laborers disguised as Christians than any other scheme which could possibly be devised. I do not intend, so far as I am concerned, to vote to enlarge the treaty by act or to let down in the slightest degree, except where required by the obligations of the United States, the present policy of the Government as to the entry of Chinese laborers into this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the first amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. QUAY. I shall not call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. President, to return to the other amendment I have offered, I will take the question upon the proposition to admit the Chinese people who assisted in the defense or relief of the foreign legations or the Pe-tang Cathedral. I ask that the amendment may be read at the desk.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to exclude Chinese who assisted in the defense or relief of the foreign legations or the Pe-tang Cathedral, in the city of Pekin, in the year 1900, but the same may be admitted upon proper consular certificates under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SPOONER. How many of those Chinese were there, and who were they?

Mr. QUAY. There were about 2,500 at the Pe-tang Cathedral, of whom I think 423 were killed or wounded. There were men, women, and children.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, those of us who are so unfortunate as to be seated in the rear of the Chamber can not hear a word of the private conversation going on between the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. QUAY. The facts as to the defense of the Pe-tang Cathedral can be derived from the statement of Archbishop Favier, the Catholic prelate in charge of the defense.

When the legations were invested, the Pe-tang Cathedral was also attacked. The leaguer of the Cathedral was established four days before the legations were assailed. At the time of the attack upon the legations the missionaries of the American Methodist Church were resisting the boxers, and defended their mission for two days. They then took with them 600 of their converts into the British legation. Others gathered and were admitted there, until the total number was perhaps 2,500.

It is admitted by every historian of the siege that the defense would have failed utterly except for those Chinese. Anyone who refers to the record can establish that. There were in all some 2,500 to 3,000 of the Chinese people—men, women, and children—in the British legation. They were placed in what was called "The Fu," a palace of a Chinese prince, which he had surreptitiously yielded to our people, which was occupied and defended by the Japanese, and which was the vital point, the object of constant attack. How many of them fell or died during the siege of the legations I do not know. So much for the Chinese at the legations.

I should say, if there is any apprehension of a flood of Chinese laborers who assisted to defend the legations, that the adult males alive to-day are not more than six to eight hundred. Many of them died during the siege, and most of those who went in were women and children.

The Pe-tang Cathedral was a splendid edifice, erected, as I remember, by the Chinese Government and presented to the Catholic Church. It was a large building of white marble, with 300 yards of frontage, and was over 200 yards in depth. Adjoining it there was an asylum of the Sisters of Charity, a sort of school for orphan children. It was attacked and invested four days before the legations were attacked. It was just 1 mile distant from the legations, and it was garrisoned by but 30 white men, in addition to the Christian Chinese converts. It was not relieved until two days after our troops entered the legations, and the history of the defense is one of the most wonderful recitals in modern literature.

I have here the personal statement of Bishop Favier, made to the author of the book The Chinese and the Allies. I will ask the Secretary to read it. It may overrun slightly the time allotted to me to speak on this amendment, but I hope the Senate will indulge me until the reading is completed, and I will not trouble them again for some time upon this or any other subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

As you know, the trouble began to be serious in the month of May (1900), and our Christians were threatened to such an extent that we decided to call them in in order to protect them. Toward the end of May we sheltered 3,000 refugees, half that number residents of Pekin itself, the other half from the surrounding country. You can imagine our anxiety when so many lives were under our care, when we realized that we had no firearms of any kind, nor any other weapon of defense. None could be obtained, and we, being priests and not fighting men, had no more idea of what was to be done than the man in the moon. But we kept cool and used our common sense. Happily, while we were busy arming ourselves with homemade spears, the guards of marines for the legations arrived. Only 30 men, French marines, with Lieut. Paul Henry in command, could at first be spared for the Pe-tang, but 10 additional Italian marines, under a sublieutenant, were eventually conceded to us. These 10 Italians were dispatched to protect the home for orphans, with its 20 foreign Sisters, which does not belong to our mission, but to that of the Sainte Enfance. By making sorties at considerable risk, for we were already surrounded by Boxers, we managed to obtain a number of staves, to which we fixed the spears of our own manufacture, and under the guidance of the officers we raised and drilled a corps of Chinese spearmen among our Christians. Our men were at first so terrified of the Boxers that we had much difficulty in getting volunteers, even to the number of 100; but as soon as they overcame their fears and perceived the contemptible cowardice of the enemy, nearly every able-bodied man joined the corps, and we had as many as 500 men, useful, however, only in manning our walls and preventing Boxers from invading our premises. We were able, nevertheless, to make several sorties and capture some stores and several of our enemies' rifles, besides some ammunition and a lot of gunpowder.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Pennsylvania has expired. The Chair understands the Senator to have asked unanimous consent that the reading of this paper might be completed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the reading will proceed.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the paper, as follows:

On or about June 12 we witnessed the first fierce attack of the Boxers on our mission. They attempted to break in by our main gate. It was a fearful moment when we saw the horde of fanatics advance with their ferocious cries of "Sha!" "Sha!" ("Kill!" "Kill!") They advanced in a solid mass and carried several standards of red and white cloth. Their yells were deafening, while the roar of gongs, drums, and horns sounded like thunder. Our women and children were terrified, but our men bore themselves with great coolness and bravery. All were ready to fight to the last and die for their cause.

When the Boxers, led by the Buddhist priests, were within a few yards of our gate, a scene of the wildest fanaticism took place. Diabolical incantations were made by their leaders, a number of men being quickly placed in a hypnotic trance. Joss sticks and images were burnt, while prostrations and other exercises, accompanied by weird chanting, took place. When the mob had been worked into a state of uncontrollable excitement, a terrific rush was made by the Boxers for our front gate. On they came, believing themselves bullet-proof. They waved their swords and stamped on the ground with their feet, yelling and gesticulating like madmen. They wore red turbans, sashes, and garters over blue clothes. Their leaders wore yellow instead of red. The Buddhist priests were urging them on, and they were now only 20 yards from our gate. Three or four volleys from the Lebel rifles of our marines left more than 50 dead on the ground. A great number of others were wounded. There was a stampede, but they sneaked back during the night and set fire to many houses around us.

This was a very trying time. The flames threatened us on every side, and we had much difficulty in saving our buildings. Our men and women worked hard day and night. Luckily we had plenty of water, and by the grace of God we managed to save our buildings. For a few days all was quiet. To our dismay and intense surprise, one morning we perceived Chinese imperial troops firing from the barricades on the Pe-tang. This necessitated fortifying our barricades. Our blankets, curtains, and clothes were hastily turned into thousands of sandbags, and we cut loopholes in our walls. Under the supervision of Lieut. Paul Henry, our Christians did marvels in the way of cutting countermines and trenches and erecting barricades. Yet another surprise awaited us. The Chinese soldiers, seeing that we could well keep them at bay, trained a gun upon our gate at a distance of 200 meters.

The regular troops fired volley after volley at us with Mannlicher and Mauser rifles. Later, a murderous fusillade with gingals (the long breech-loading rifles) was kept up for several hours. At last a well-aimed shot from the Chinese gun blew up our weakened gate. A panic took possession of our women and children, but our brave Lieutenant Henry got his men together and opened a quick fire on the Chinese artillerymen, who ran to the left and right, actually abandoning their gun. The lieutenant, some soldiers, and a number of our Christians, led by our Fathers—Father Giron principally—bravely made a sortie and captured the gun with some ammunition. The Chinese, under shelter of houses and behind walls, opened a hot fire on our party, killing one and wounding five. This gun, although not a very powerful one, was a great acquisition, and it gave us renewed confidence in our power of defense. Moreover, in several other sorties by our volunteers and marines, a search was made in the neighboring houses that had not been destroyed by fire, and a quantity of gunpowder and ammunition was seized and brought back to Pe-tang. The gun was of assistance to us during the seige, and as luck would have it we found among our Christians an old Chinese artilleryman, who well knew how to work it. Alas! when we were feeling proud of his good practice a Chinese shell cut the poor man in two.

Next came a period of daily attacks, duly repulsed. We were bombarded from all sides, but held our own. On June 24, at half past 6 o'clock in the morning, just as we were about to celebrate the "Mass of the Sacred Heart," a terrific roar of artillery shook Pe-tang. The Chinese had placed, 500 yards to the southwest, a battery of 10 Krupp guns of the latest pattern, some of which fired shell of 30 centimeters in diameter. They directed their fire on the façade of our church, which they hit with great accuracy. We counted as many as 536 shells received on that day alone. Three hundred and fifty more shells were fired at us during the following two days, June 25 and 26. Another powerful battery was placed to the north, but our marines maintained such a hot fire at 700 yards that the Chinese were unable to man the guns. It was during those terrible three days that the church was reduced to the wrecked condition in which it is at present. The cross on its highest point was blown down by a shell on June 25, amidst the wild cries of delight "Ho, ho, ho!" of the Boxers and soldiers outside.

The Mission of Pe-tang was continually bombarded for twenty-four days, during which time we were struck by over 2,400 shells and cannon balls. Whether the Chinese ran short of ammunition or whether their artillery was suddenly called elsewhere, I could not say; but after those dreadful days of death, wreck, and ruin, many more of which we could not have endured, we had two or three days of comparative quiet.

Another kind of missile, primitive if you like, yet uglier than any other with which we had previously made acquaintance, was flung by hand, so near to us was the enemy intrenched. Not more than 4 or 5 yards divided the Chinese breastworks and ours. This missile was a "pot à feu," a fire pot, a kind of casserole filled with 2 or 3 pounds of gunpowder and inflammable stuff and caused to explode by a long fuse. Over 300 of these were thrown into our compound, and we were unable to get near and put them out before they exploded, for the Chinese kept up a hot fire on us from all sides. This was a diabolical attempt to set our buildings on fire on every side and drive us out to be massacred.

An innumerable quantity of small gunpowder balls with fuses were thrown over our works of defense for several days, and the continuous explosions shattered most of our windows to pieces, setting fire here and there to our premises. More terrible in their effects were the iron rockets thrown with great force by means of an ingenious contrivance. Their velocity was increased by the gradual cumbustion of powder in the lower portion of the rocket. The iron cylinder was about 2 feet long, with a sharp point screwed at the end, and a stick 3 yards long fixed at the lower extremity. These rockets shot through the air at a terrific pace and pierced any wall or roof better than a cannon ball. They, too, like the fire pot, contained some inflammable matter which set ablaze the buildings they struck. We were obliged constantly to watch where these rockets fell, and we feared them more than any other missile thrown at us. Thanks to our vigilance, we were able to put out all conflagrations as soon as they began. It must have been tantalizing to the Chinese to see all their means of destruction fail, for they now devised stronger and fiercer ways of annihilating us.

On July 10, at 10 o'clock in the morning, a frightful explosion shook us all off our feet. The Chinese had succeeded in blowing up a mine, which was happily not long enough to reach directly under any of our buildings. It, however, split the houses east of the asylum for orphans (the Jen-se-tang), killed one person, and wounded several.

With their nerves already shattered by fear and terrible privations, with shells and bullets flying and bursting constantly among and over us, our women and children fell into a panic at this new method of doing away with us by blowing us up. They tremblingly huddled together, weeping, moaning, and praying. It was pitiable to watch them. They imagined they heard noises underground in every direction, and continually expected their last hour. In fact, they were not far wrong, for three days later, to the west, a second mine, much better bored, and passing under the yellow wall of the imperial city, burst with a terrific crash. We had foreseen this mine, and our workmen were hard at work cutting a counter mine. Twenty-five out of 30 of our men were killed on the spot and 28 seriously wounded. The Marist Father who was presiding over the works, was killed.

Another fierce attack of the Boxers was repulsed, and we chased them for some distance, but unhappily lost our French quartermaster, who was shot dead by a Chinese bullet. Although the dead and wounded in the Pe-tang and Jen-se-tang were many, this was only the second death among our European defenders.

After the explosion of the mine the asylum of Jen-se-tang was too insecure to live in, and we were obliged to convey our Sisters of Charity, with the women and children, to the eastern side of our compound, where they could better be protected and defended. Many of the women had become hysterical, and their fear was so great that they believed they heard our enemies boring mines underfoot day and night. Every moment they dreaded other explosions. To pacify them and ourselves—for we all had a feeling that we might be blown up at any moment—we made several sorties. In fact, we discovered three more mines in course of construction. We removed the electric wires, destroyed the batteries attached to them, and rendered the mines useless. It is probable that dynamite was employed in these, and we considered ourselves lucky to have escaped destruction, when, on July 22, a third and more terrific explosion than we had before experienced destroyed the entire east side of the Jen-se-tang. Eighty lives were lost, among them those of 51 children, little orphans. The Chinese soldiers kept up a hot fire on us when we tried to disinter the wounded from the wreckage and ruins, and we lost all hope of saving anyone.

Of the 10 Italian marines who defended the Jen-se-tang, 4 died on that fatal day, and their officer and 1 soldier were buried for over three-quarters of an hour. Hearing their voices underground, we unearthed them. They were slightly wounded, but, thanks to our Lord, still alive.

On July 30 a further attack was made on the same side by the Boxers and imperial troops combined. The French commandant, Paul Henry, with a handful of marines, rushed to the assistance of the Italians, who had no more ammunition. He repulsed the Boxers over their barricade, from which he was now about to drive them, when a bullet struck him in the neck and another in the side. Yet he fought on with amazing courage until, feeling his strength giving way, he dragged himself back into the orphan asylum, where, receiving the holy blessing of the Sisters, he breathed his last.

Paul Henry was only 23 years of age. His tragic death brought desolation upon the Pe-tang and Jen-se-tang, our Christians weeping bitterly over the loss of our brave commandant and declaring that a hundred of them would gladly die together if his life could only be preserved.

Three French soldiers were severely wounded in the fight. Two had previously been killed, so that out of 40 our defense was now reduced to 23 men, commanded by a corporal.

The long-expected relief did not arrive, and on August 1 we had provisions for only six days. We had to reduce our rations to one-half—that is to say, 4 ounces of food per day per person. This would have brought us to August 12, but on August 8, seeing that there was no immediate hope of being freed from our anguish, we had further to reduce by half the already meager daily allowance. Two ounces of food a day—that was all! And what food! The leaves, roots, and bark of trees, unripe fruit, and even flowers and grass were devoured by our starving crowd. Our improvised spearmen, unable to carry their weapons any longer, lay half dead of hunger on our verandas.

When the Boxers came again several times to attack us, scarcely 25 of our spearmen out of 500 were able to drag themselves to defend our barricades.

The evening of August 14 we still had two days' rations at 2 ounces each.

On the 15th, at 2 o'clock in the morning, a formidable cannonading was heard to the east. We listened; we speculated. Could it be the relieving army coming? And as the guns thundered in the distance a faint ray of hope shone in the 3,000 hearts of the poor Christian souls besieged in the Pe-tang. The guns seemed to draw nearer, and the whole day of the 15th we felt certain that the allied troops had entered Pekin. Every moment we expected to see white soldiers arrive, but toward evening our hopes, raised suddenly very high, sank again deep—as deep as they could go. We almost gave ourselves up for lost, all the more as the bullets from the Chinese soldiers and Boxers pelted down on us much more plentifully than they had done before. Had we had the strength to think, the night would have been a long and terrible one, but we were too much exhausted. Few of us had even the strength to stand on our legs. The next morning, the 16th, toward 6 o'clock we heard the firing getting closer and closer. There were volleys and volleys fired in quick succession in the direction of the Sihwamen (gate of the yellow or imperial town), by which the Petang is approached from the east, and only 400 yards from the mission. Surely we plainly distinguished that these were not Chinese rifles. Our hearts bounded with joy. In a superhuman, nervous strain our strength seemed to return to us as by magic. Men ran hither and thither, regardless of bullets; the women pressed the children to their hearts and prayed.

The Japanese troops, unable to blow up the gate with their artillery, had climbed over the wall and had opened it. On they hastened to the Pe-tang. A Japanese officer and soldier rushed into the courtyard. In the meantime the French troops, commanded by General Frey, arrived posthaste, and Captain Marty's company scaled the walls with ladders provided by the mission; while the Japanese burst open the front gate, having bravely marched through a deadly fusillade from a Chinese barricade. The French marines made a successful flank movement, and the Chinese were defeated. Unfortunately, Captain Marty was wounded and four men were killed. The Pe-tang was relieved.

When our Christians saw the troops entering some wept with joy, others knelt down and prayed fervently and crossed themselves. Many of them suddenly collapsed with nervous prostration. But the majority were too weak to realize that they had been saved.

The Boxers, during our siege, constantly sent in arrows with letters to our Christians promising to spare the lives of all converts if they delivered up the two bishops and other Europeans. Among 3,000 of our Catholics not one man—not one man—wavered for an instant, nor showed any sign of treachery during such trying times. They one and all behaved like heroes, ready at any moment to sacrifice their own lives for the sake of others. Our attempts to communicate with the legations and the outside world failed, and, alas! with disastrous results. Our first messenger who volunteered to bring a message was seized by the Boxers on leaving our compound. He was skinned alive; the skin and head were hung outside our main gate. During sixty days we neither sent nor received a single message nor did we have a single day of truce, the hatred of the Boxers being shown in a fiercer way toward us than upon the legations, probably because the cowardly crowd knew that we were weaker.

During the siege the park of Pe-tang received over 400 bodies of men killed under fire, women and children who died of hunger, or in explosions of mines, shells, or fire rockets. Besides, the brave Lieut. Paul Henry, the quartermaster, the general visitor of the Marists, the father superior of the same brotherhood, a father of the mission, four French soldiers, and an Italian find eternal rest in our graveyard.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, like nearly everybody else I have for many years shared in the conviction that Chinese laborers ought to be excluded from the United States on account of obvious economic conditions. I have, however, had a good deal of difficulty in bringing myself to cast a vote for the bill reported by the committee for two reasons.

In the first place, it appears to me that it unnecessarily irritates the Chinese Government, and especially the commercial classes in China, and it may, although I am not certain about that, operate to hinder our commercial progress in the Far East. In the second place, I regard it as of immense importance to the dignity of the Government of the United States to observe in the most generous way the terms of the treaty of 1894 with China.

I think this whole matter can be settled by proper diplomatic negotiations, and that we ought to continue the operation of the present laws, which have been declared to be effective by the commercial bodies of San Francisco, until a modification of the treaty will enable us, without disparaging the people of China in an unnecessary way, to take such steps as may then be thought necessary to safeguard the interests of the working people of the United States.

I hesitate, however, about enlarging the terms of the treaty as proposed by the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I feel that this Government ought to do something, and I believe it has done nothing to recognize, officially, the fidelity of many people at the siege of Pekin who became our allies and our friends in defense of the lives of the diplomatic agents of our own Government and of other governments shut up in the British legation in that city.

I suppose I have taken more interest in that aspect of it than many others have taken, because the people of the State of Iowa had a very great anxiety, differing somewhat from the general public interest, about the situation in Pekin. We had shut up there one of our best-beloved citizens, Major Conger, and his wife and family, who throughout that siege sought and received the aid and help of faithful Chinese people who were enlisted with them in the prevention of Boxer outrages. That whole history presents a record of heroism which has been better appreciated in other countries than it has in our own.

From those who managed the defense of the foreigners (and I believe the main part of it was in the hands of the American minister) to the humblest Chinese subject who, at the risk of life and his standing with his own people, came to the help of the imperiled legations, every one of them is entitled to the gratitude and good will of the civilized world. They earned it, and long after these debates about Chinese exclusion shall have passed from the public mind there will be throughout the Christian world a generous and universal recognition of the heroism of the American minister and those who were associated with him, including citizens and subjects of China, in the defense of the lives and the property of strangers in the Chinese capital.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the difficulty about this amendment is that it contains two provisions. One of them, perhaps, would be fair and might be enforced, and that is to permit the men who participated in that struggle to come to this country. No doubt they might be picked out and designated, and we would know just who they were, and no one would come in under that provision except such as were entitled to come; and I join with my friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] in paying a tribute to the heroism of the men who risked their lives upon that occasion.

But there is another provision in the amendment—I do not want to deal lightly with this subject, but the fact is it can hardly escape criticism—which provides that Chinese Christians may come here.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Minnesota allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. That part of the amendment has already been disposed of and voted down. The pending question is upon the admission of Chinese soldiers who fought for us.

Mr. CLAPP. All I can say is that the Senate has lost one of the best speeches it might have heard this session. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I believe the effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania would be an invasion of the policy of excluding Chinese; besides it is not practical, and therefore it should not be passed.

I find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this statement, uttered in the debate yesterday by the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]:

> When we consider that the Republican party worships at the shrine of wealth, when we consider that it regards the sole or at least the chief duty of government to be the conservation of wealth rather than the promotion of an honest, intelligent, and patriotic citizenship, the wonder to my mind is not that sentiment should have crystallized against this measure on the other side of the Chamber, but that there should be found anybody upon that side strong enough, with patriotism and statesmanship enough in his composition to cast aside the influences of his environment and give his support to the bill.

Mr. President, to my mind this is a harsh and unjust arraignment of a great party. It has no bearing on the question before the Senate. It is not logical; not convincing; does no good; serves no purpose. Because the Senator does not agree with the Republican party does not make it bad or hopeless, no matter how strongly he may think it does.

I regret that the senior Senator from Washington, whom I do not see in the Chamber, has such a bad opinion of the Republican party, which has done so much for the good of the country and which holds within its folds a majority of the American people. I do not have such an opinion of his party. I think in the main political parties mean well and wish the good of the whole country. They may be mistaken in their methods, plans, and policies in seeking the good of the country, but nothing more.

Bitter sayings and bitter charges and assaults are not arguments. It is easy to say harsh or bitter things, but difficult to say just things and always be just.

I deny the statement of the Senator from Washington on behalf of the Republican party, and I do so lest the Senator might think that because it is not denied it is admitted. I wish to say to the Senator that I am just as much opposed to the admission of Chinese as he possibly can be, but because I can not vote for a bill so loosely drawn, so drastic, one that is an insult to a friendly power, that violates treaty obligations and puts in peril our trade and commerce now and for the future, I do not want it to be set down against me that for that reason I am opposed to the exclusion of Chinese.

Mr. President, I believe in organized labor and rejoice in the triumphs it has made in the interest of the wage-earners. Clearly, if capital in its interest can unite, combine, and organize, labor should also. I desire in every possible way to provide wholesome laws that will protect American labor. I do not believe in class legislation of any kind. Congress must consider the whole country in passing laws, and legislate for all the people and the whole country.

I will never favor a law that will directly or indirectly degrade the American wage-earner nor put him in competition with Chinese labor. I heartily favor the exclusion of Chinese labor from the United States, but I claim the right to judge of the methods by which this exclusion shall be made efficient. Because I do not favor the committee bill is no evidence that I oppose Chinese exclusion.

The best way to help American labor is not by words and declarations, but by doing something in its behalf, by extending our trade and commerce, protecting American industries, building up American interests on sea and land, and thereby providing employment for our people willing to work. I feel constrained to say this much on the subject of labor, because the attempt has been made to create the impression that only those who support this bill are the friends of the wage-earner, which is not true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. QUAY. I should be glad if the Senate would give me the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the amendment. I suppose there are not enough in favor of it to second the call, but I should like to put my vote on record in favor of the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 7, nays 68; as follows:

YEAS—7.

Burton,	Hoar,	Proctor,	Vest.
Dolliver,	Platt, N. Y.	Quay,

NAYS—68.

Aldrich,	Deboe,	Jones, Nev.	Pettus,

NOT VOTING—13.

Bailey,	Dryden,	McEnery,	Morgan.
Blackburn,	Dubois,	McMillan,
Daniel,	Hale,	Mason,
Depew,	Hansbrough,	Mitchell,

So Mr. QUAY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I find that two or three additional amendments are required because of the change of sections. It is merely renumbering sections. On page 25, line 20, I move that the word "fifty-three" be stricken out and the word "fifty-one" be inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator from Indiana will permit me, in order to bring the whole question properly before the Senate, I move that the House bill be taken up, and that the Senate bill, which we are now endeavoring to perfect, be substituted for it.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I want to make two more amendments.

Mr. PENROSE. You can make them afterwards. I make the motion.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I suggest that we had better complete the pending bill first.

Mr. PENROSE. I make the motion.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HOAR. If the motion prevail to take up a House bill at this time, would it not set aside the pending bill and with it the unanimous-consent-agreement, all arrangements having been made for closing debate?

Mr. GALLINGER. I make the further point that this is not competent under the unanimous-consent agreement, which was to consider the amendments pending to this bill and the bill itself.

Mr. HALE. Moreover, there is already a substitute offered by the Senator from Connecticut which is before the Senate, and certainly before any other bill could be offered as a substitute the Senate would be entitled to have a vote on that.

Mr. LODGE. As I understand it, the proposition is to take the House bill from the Calendar and strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute the Senate bill. Then the Senator from Connecticut will offer his amendment for the Senate bill, the object being to bring the bill into conference.

Mr. HALE. That puts it one step farther off. If the House bill is to be taken from the Calendar, it clearly is in violation of the agreement that we should consider this bill. It can not be in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that under the unanimous-consent agreement all of the amendments proposed to the original text and the substitute offered by the Senator from Connecticut should first be voted on, and then the Chair would think he ought to entertain the motion, whether made by the Senator from Connecticut to substitute his or the Senator from Pennsylvania to move to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then——.

Mr. HOAR. I beg pardon; I should not have interrupted the Chair. As I understand the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania, it is that a certain House bill be now taken up, and not to make it an amendment to the present bill. We have a unanimous-consent agreement that a pending Senate measure, which has been debated for many days, shall be voted upon to-day, or, at any rate, that it shall be considered until voted upon under the five-minute rule. Now, the substitution of another measure which is on the Calendar sweeps that all out of the way. It can only be done by unanimous consent, and that would be a unanimous-consent agreement in violation of another.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was what the Chair held. The Chair was about to say when the Senator from Massachusetts rose that after the unanimous-consent agreement has fulfilled its purpose, then clearly it would be the right of the Senator from Pennsylvania to move to take up the House bill. The majority of the Senate could take it up.

Mr. PENROSE. I withdraw my motion, and will make it later on.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. In line 12, page 29, I move to strike out "twenty-one" and insert "nineteen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. On the same page, line 13, I move to strike out "twenty-two" and insert "twenty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. On page 37, line 6, I move to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty-eight."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I ask if my amendment is now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] offers an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to say a word about my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow the amendment to the amendment to be stated?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] offers an amendment to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. The amendment will be read in the Senate.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the substitute the following:

It shall be unlawful for any vessel holding an American register to have or to employ in its crew any Chinese person not entitled to admission to the United States, or into the portion of the territory of the United States to which such vessel plies; and any violation of this provision shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $2,000.

But said penalty shall not accrue in the case of any such vessel which shall suffer the loss of a portion of her crew by reason of distress or stress of weather in any foreign jurisdiction or port and shall be compelled thereby to employ Chinese seamen to complete her complement of officers and men: Provided, That to relieve from said penalty in such case it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the appropriate Treasury officer that in such foreign jurisdiction or port no seamen other than Chinese were obtainable, and that every such Chinese seamen was discharged from the service of such vessel immediately upon the arrival thereof at the first port where seamen other than Chinese could be obtained, and that if so discharged at any port under the jurisdiction of the United States no such Chinese seamen was permitted to depart from such vessel, but that each such Chinese seamen was forthwith transported as a passenger on such vessel and at the expense thereof to a foreign port, and that no such Chinese seamen did reenter the service of such vessel after such discharge.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I have taken little time in this debate, and I wish now within the five minutes to which I am entitled to state as concisely as I can the reason why I propose to substitute for the bill which has been perfected the amendment which is now pending before the Senate.

The United States is committed to the policy of the exclusion of Chinese laborers. There is no difference of opinion on that subject. Suggestions from any quarter that Senators on this side desire to break down that policy, to break down the laws existing at present on our statute books and any proper Treasury regulations so as to admit Chinese laborers into this country, are entirely gratuitous and without foundation.

But, Mr. President, this bill of the committee goes vastly further than that. It is unnecessary and I do not care to call as witnesses Senators in this debate advocating the bill, who have said that it was unnecessary, but I call Mr. Dunn and Mr. Livernash, both of whom admit that the existing law as administered is sufficient. Mr. Dunn says:

I am now prepared to meet any charges that the law is not effectually and honestly enforced at all of the Western seaports.

He says:

The number of applicants for admission of all classes is reduced almost to the legitimate traffic.

Mr. Livernash says in reply to a question of the chairman as to whether the laws are effective to keep out Chinese laborers:

Generally speaking, yes.

I plant myself on that, Mr. President. There is no necessity for any new law on this subject in order to keep Chinese laborers out of the country, and I call as witnesses Mr. Dunn and Mr. Livernash.

I believe that the bill as it stands to-day, after the amendments which have been made, does violate at least the spirit of our treaty with China. I believe it violates the letter, but unquestionably it violates the spirit of that treaty, and if we would keep faith with China, if we would preserve the open door and not close it, we should not offend China in this matter.

There is certainly in the bill one clause that China says is violative of the treaty. It is to be found in the third section, and it is as follows:

And every Chinese person shall be deemed a laborer, within the meaning of this act, who is not an official, a teacher, a student, a merchant, or a traveler for curiosity or pleasure.

That was in the projet which the United States commissioners submitted to the Chinese commissioners, and it was on the objection of the Chinese commissioners left out of the treaty, and to go now and put it into this bill would be a direct insult to China.

One word more, for my time allows me but the fewest words. I consider it extremely bad legislation to attempt to incorporate in statutes all Treasury regulations. Statutes should not be drawn in that way any more than constitutions of State governments should attempt to deal with all subjects of legislation. The time may come when Treasury regulations may properly be and ought to be suspended or changed. That power is contained in my amendment. You might as well in passing a tariff bill include all the Treasury regulations for the custom-houses and for the General Board of Appraisers. You might as well, in passing an internal-revenue law, include all the Treasury regulations and decisions and condensation of practices in the statute. It is bad legislation. So I make these three points: This legislation is unnecessary to continue the exclusion of Chinese laborers; it is offensive to the Government of China, with which we wish to remain on good terms; and then it is bad legislation in that no bill ought to include all Treasury regulations and decisions in it.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I ask the attention of the Senator who has just taken his seat. I intend to vote for this substitute, but I submit that we add to it. It proposes to provide that said laws shall apply, first, to all territory under the jurisdiction of the United States; second, to all immigration of Chinese laborers from the island to the mainland territory of the United States, and, third, from one portion of the island territory of the United States to another portion of said island territory.

Provided, however, That this shall not apply to the transit of Chinese laborers from one island to another island of the same group, or to any islands within the jurisdiction of any State or of the district of Alaska.

I submit that thereby the laws are made not to apply to any islands of any State jurisdiction or attached to Alaska, and that it means exactly the opposite of what the verbiage intends. It does admit Chinese laborers to islands belonging to States and to islands belonging to the district of Alaska.

I suggest and submit to the Senator from Connecticut that if he will make this slight change he will thereby do what he now intends:

Provided, however, That said laws shall not apply to the transit of Chinese persons from one island to another island of the same group, and any islands within the jurisdiction of any State or of the district of Alaska shall be considered part of the mainland under this section

Mr. LODGE. The portion to which the Senator from Maryland now refers was offered by me as an amendment to the substitute of the Senator from Connecticut and accepted by him. I think the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maryland will improve it and make it more exact to carry out the undoubted intention.

Mr. McCOMAS. I am glad the Senator thinks so. I think it would improve it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If it is satisfactory to the Senator from Massachusetts I will accept it.

Mr. McCOMAS. Then I will move it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment to the amendment pending. Will the Senator suspend until that amendment has been acted upon?

Mr. McCOMAS. Certainly; I will offer it later.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I come from a section which is supposed to be peculiarly interested in the exclusion of Chinese laborers, and I wish simply to state my position with reference to this proposed legislation.

I shall vote for the bill reported by the committee, with the amendments which have been adopted. I am opposed to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Connecticut. I think the adoption of the committee bill in no way violates the provisions of our treaty with China. We are in the habit of legislating in regard to the admission of aliens into the United States with reference to our own interests and our own safety, and we have never so far made legislation of that character dependent upon conventions with foreign nations. But as to China, her ancient policy has been, and that policy now is, to prevent the expatriation of her own people.

Those who are seeking admission to our shores are of the more degraded and, I might say, criminal, or at least undesirable, classes. We exclude them for our peace and safety and in the interest of the Chinaman as well as in the interest of the American. If they are admitted within our borders they are going to disturb our peace and we will have tragedies enacted such as at one time occurred in the State of Wyoming.

It is important that this legislation in regard to the exclusion of these people shall be explicit and clear upon the face of the law itself and not be dependent upon the caprice and changing whims of those who may administer that law. That is in the interest of China as well as it is in our own interest. It is fair to any nation or any people to disclose to them exactly upon what condition they may or may not be permitted to come to our shores.

I disagree wholly with this substitute proposition, which purports to leave the enactment of the various provisions which are now embodied in the original bill reported by the committee to the Treasury Department, or to subordinate officials of the Treasury Department. They may not be given that publicity which they ought to have in order to disclose to the people who may desire to come here the conditions upon which they may be admitted.

Mr. President, for the three reasons that we have a right to protect our people, to legislate with reference to our own interests, and exclude undesirable or criminal classes from our shores, especially when it is in harmony with the purpose of our Government, whose purpose it is to prevent the expatriation of their own people, and that the regulations ought to be prescribed in the law itself and not be left to Treasury regulations, I shall cast my vote in favor of the bill reported by the committee and against the proposed substitute.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, were it not that the names of Mr. Dunn and Mr. Livernash have been used frequently by Senators upon the other side I would not say anything at this time. But when the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] defends what is known as the Platt substitute, as he says upon the testimony of Mr. Dunn and Mr. Livernash, since these gentlemen can not appear upon the floor of this Chamber to defend themselves, I feel that it is my duty to say at least a word.

The Senator from New Hampshire, thoughtlessly no doubt, does not do justice to either Mr. Dunn or Mr. Livernash. Mr. Livernash in what he had to say about existing legislation when he came to the city of Washington, had always coupled with it the necessity for additional legislation touching the Philippine Islands, excluding Chinese from the Philippines and preventing their coming into the mainland of the United States from the Philippine Islands. The commission appointed by that great State convention in the State of California came to Washington without knowledge of the existing suits pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, five in number, which, if two are decided as those who have lodged the suits there expect to have them decided, would practically paralyze the enforcement of the treaty and of all the rules and regulations. Therefore, they changed from simple existing legislation, coupled with the necessity for legislation of the kind I have mentioned touching the Philippines, to a new affirmative bill in which the law as it exists would be incorporated.

Now one word about Mr. Dunn. Why the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] should have made the fierce and, I think, uncalled for attack upon Mr. Dunn I do not know. Mr. Dunn was never before the Committee on Immigration except at the request of the committee, and a more modest, sensible, practical gentleman it was never my fortune to come in contact with. He volunteered nothing to the committee and it was only when questions were asked him that he made responses to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. President, it is unfair, as I suggested originally, to seek to put this upon the shoulders either of Mr. Livernash or Mr. Dunn, or upon the shoulders of both of them, because they never intended to and they never have carried it.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. President, one moment. I read from Mr. Dunn's own statement this morning evidence enough, I thought, to the Senate as to how far he had gone in influencing the members of the committee. The underlying feeling of criticism explained itself, and what else I said in that connection I also said I was responsible for. I want to repeat that statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. MALLORY. On that let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut (when Mr. ALDRICH'S name was called). The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] has been called from the Chamber. I understand he is paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. HEITFELD (when Mr. DUBOIS'S name was called). I again desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. DUBOIS] is paired with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN]. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I am paired on this bill with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], but as he would vote "nay" on this amendment, I will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll was concluded.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I transfer the pair I have with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 50; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bacon,	Culberson,	Mitchell,	Taliaferro,
Bailey,	Foster, La.	Money,	Teller,
Bard,	Harris,	Nelson,	Tillman,

NOT VOTING—9.

Aldrich,	Dryden,	McEnery,	Quay,
Daniel,	Dubois,	Mason,	Simon.
Depew,

So Mr. MALLORY'S amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, as I understand, it is now in order to amend the substitute proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. PETTUS. Then I ask leave to offer an amendment to come in on page 2, in section 3, line 22, after the word "regulations," to insert "not inconsistent with the laws of the land."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If I may, I will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move an amendment to the amendment, to come in as section 4, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of the amendment the following as a new section:

SEC. 4. That nothing in the provisions of this act or any other act shall be construed to prevent, hinder, or restrict any foreign exhibitor, representative, or citizen of any foreign nation, or the holder, who is a citizen of any foreign nation, of any concession or privilege from any fair or exposition authorized by act of Congress, from bringing into the United States, under contract, such mechanics, artisans, agents, or other employees, natives of their respective foreign countries, as they or any of them may deem necessary for the purpose of making preparation for installing or conducting their exhibits or of preparing for installing or conducting any business authorized or permitted under or by virtue of or pertaining to any concession or privilege which may have been or may be granted by any said fair or exposition in connection with such exposition, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, both as to the admission and return of such person or persons.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, that is substantially the same provision that was made by the act of August 5, 1892, in regard to the World's Columbian Exposition, and also by the act of June 6, 1900, for the Buffalo Exposition.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. As I understand, that is practically the same amendment which has already been put into the bill by the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Substantially the same.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I make no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which I believe is agreeable to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will be stated,

The SECRETARY. In section 1, on page 2, line 9, of the amendment submitted by Mr. PLATT, before the word "shall," it is proposed to strike out "this" and insert "said law;" in line 11, before the word "any," to strike out "or to" and insert "and;" and in line 12, after the word "Alaska," to insert "shall be considered part of the mainland under this section;" so as to read:

Provided, however, That said law shall not apply to the transit of Chinese laborers from one island to another island of the same group, and any islands within the jurisdiction of any State or of the district of Alaska shall be considered part of the mainland under this section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The Secretary calls my attention to some additional amendments needed because of the change in the numbers of the sections. At the close of section 11, on page 10, line 8, after the word "section," I move to strike out "26" and insert "24;" in section 21, page 22, line 4, after the word "section," I move to strike out "53," and insert "51;" in section 34, on page 37, line 6, after the word "section," I move to strike out "50," and insert "48;" and in section 42, on page 42, line 16, after the word "section," I move to strike out "53" and insert "51."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendments submitted by the Senator from Indiana.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON. I inquire, Mr. President, whether or not the amendment touching exhibitions and expositions, which has been made to the substitute, has been made to the original bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I was not present during the consideration of a portion of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I think that same amendment was inserted in the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not find it in the printed copy of the bill I have.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is not in the printed copy.

Mr. MITCHELL. The amendment has not been voted on, I think.

Mr. PATTERSON. I offer a similar amendment to the committee bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] offers the same amendment to the original bill, which has just been offered to the substitute bill by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] and adopted. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON. I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]:

That from and after the passage of this act the coming of Chinese laborers from any foreign country to the United States, its Territories, or any territory under its jurisdiction, insular or otherwise, shall be absolutely prohibited: Provided, That this prohibition shall not extend to officials, teachers, students, merchants, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure.

I want to state to the Senate, Mr. President, that, doubtless by inadvertence of the Senators upon the other side, the exclusion of the Chinese from our insular territory has not been provided for in the substitute offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No, Mr. President——

Mr. PATTERSON. One moment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Excuse me. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. PATTERSON. And it is of the first importance that whichever bill shall ultimately be adopted by the Senate, it shall contain a provision placing the Philippines and other islands of the United States upon an equality with the mainland in the matter of Chinese exclusion.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, it is true that the substitute does not deal with the question of the admission of Chinese laborers into the Philippine Islands, and I do not think that it ought to do so. That question is under consideration by another committee of this body, of which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] is a member.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Connecticut state by what committee?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I would state that the Committee on the Philippines has perfected several bills and has reported to the Senate, but none of them contains any provision of this character.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Well, Mr. President, whether that is strictly true or not, Governor Taft certainly testified before that committee that the authorities of the Philippine Islands were not ready to determine that question as yet; that there was some question as to whether it was not advisable to allow artisans from China to come to the Philippine Islands to perform skilled labor which the Filipinos were not at present capable of performing, and to remain there for such time as it should be necessary to educate the Filipinos to the performance of such skilled labor. At present, under an exclusion order issued by General Otis, I believe, no Chinese are admitted to the islands; and I thought that question might more properly be left to the determination of the committee specially constituted by this body to determine it—that is, the Philippine Committee—than to attempt to determine it in this general offhand way during the consideration of the present bill.

I want to say this about it: The conditions are entirely different. We are trying by this bill to exclude Chinese laborers from competition with American laborers, and by "American laborers" I mean those of our own home country, who occupy an entirely different standard as laborers from the laborers of the Philippines. The conditions are entirely different. I do not think that the Senate can decide to-day, in this offhand way, whether it be necessary for the protection of the Filipino laborer that no Chinese laborers of any sort, skilled or unskilled, shall be admitted into the Philippine Islands. I think it may well be left to the committee which has particular charge of such matters, and that it might as well be deferred for the present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Committee on the Philippines left the matter of Chinese immigration in the Philippines to the Committee on Immigration, thinking it belonged more particularly with the general subject. But, as I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, it now applies to the Philippine Islands and to all territory under the jurisdiction of the United States the same laws of exclusion that now exist in regard to the mainland territory. Unless I am very much mistaken in regard to the amendment which I offered last night, which the Senator from Connecticut accepted, and which is now a part of his amendment, no Chinese laborers can be admitted into the Philippine Islands and no Chinese laborers can pass from the Philippine Islands into the United States or into Hawaii or can come from Hawaii into the United States. The language of the amendment as amended is:

That is the acts referred to in the first section—

All laws now in force prohibiting and regulating the coming of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent shall apply to all territory under the jurisdiction of the United States, and to all immigration of Chinese laborers from the island to the mainland territory of the United States, or from one portion of the island territory of the United States to another portion of said island territory.

I for one, Mr. President, could never give my assent to any bill which did not protect the Philippine Islands from the invasion of Chinese immigration; and I think that the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, which simply extends existing laws, extends all of those laws to the Philippine Islands, and by doing so it puts it beyond the power of the Philippine Commission to admit Chinese labor in any form into the Philippine Islands until Congress shall enact otherwise. I believe that if the Senate considers the existing laws are sufficient for the exclusion of Chinese labor the Philippines will receive the same protection that the mainland territory of the United States receives.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, upon this question of excluding Chinamen from the Philippine Islands, I think I may say that the testimony taken before the Committee on the Philippines bearing upon that subject, looking to the interest, peace, and welfare of the islands, is, without conflict, against the policy of admitting Chinamen to the islands. I think that was the purport of the testimony of Governor Taft. It was clearly the testimony of General Otis. General MacArthur, who has had much experience there, and who displayed great intelligence in dealing with this question, was very emphatic in the assertion that to admit Chinamen into the islands would be most disastrous to their peace and to their welfare.

We also know, Mr. President, that there are certain classes of people in Manila, newspapers there, interested in a rapid exploitation of the islands for selfish ends, and not in the interest either of the people of the islands or of the people of the United States, who are importunate in their demands on the Commission to break down this barrier and admit Chinamen into the islands in order that they may have cheap labor.

Mr. President, as stated by the chairman of the Committee on the Philippines, that committee has not undertaken to deal with this question, because it is more germane to the matter now under consideration before the Senate. If it be left to the Philippine Commission to determine, I have no doubt that, as it is now organized, Chinese will not be excluded from the islands, and if they are not it means continued disturbance in the islands and great additional burdens upon this country in its efforts to preserve peace. Every consideration, it seems to me, demands that the pending bill should effectively deal with this question.

Mr. TELLER. Whatever we do, we certainly ought to do it so that we shall know what we have done when we get through. The Senator from Connecticut does not think that anything in his amendment prohibits Chinamen from going into the Philippine Islands.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If the Senator from Colorado will permit me, I think one of the virtues of a Senator, when he finds he is mistaken, is to say so, and the amendment which was proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts and accepted by me, I find does say—

That said laws shall apply—

That is, the laws extended and continued in force—to the territory under the jurisdiction of the United States and to all immigration of Chinese laborers from the island to the mainland territory of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the Senator modifies his position and admits that the Senator from Massachusetts is correct.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. He is.

Mr. TELLER. I thought at least it would be very singular if we went through with this bill with the Senator from Connecticut giving it one interpretation and the Senator from Massachusetts another. We might have had some difficulty in construing it after it had been signed by the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] to page 49 of the committee bill. A few moments ago the Senator offered an amendment, which was accepted, touching the entrance of Chinese for exhibition purposes, and if he will look at page 49 he will see that it is in the original bill in about the same words. Therefore the amendment which has been adopted ought to be reconsidered.

Mr. PATTERSON. I move that the vote by which the amendment was adopted be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote will be reconsidered, and the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call attention to a rather peculiar condition in the Senate. The principal advocate of the bill does not know what is in it, and the principal advocate of the amendment does not know what is in it.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. President, I shall not vote for the bill reported by the committee, and I am inclined to vote for the substitute offered by the Senator from Connecticut. But as I read it, there is no question about the fact that Congress in passing this substitute and continuing the Chinese-exclusion law does not do it only for the United States as formerly known, the mainland of the country, but for all of the island possessions acquired. The question comes, If Congress in this act can exclude the Chinaman from the Philippine Islands by force of its power in this country, how can it exclude the inhabitants of those islands from the right and privilege they should have under the Constitution of coming from the Philippine Islands into other parts of the United States? To my mind Congress has no right to do this, and therefore I move, as an amendment to the amendment, to strike out all that comes in the fifth line of the first section after the words "the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will pardon the Chair, there is an amendment pending, offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON]. Was it withdrawn?

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Presiding Officer allow the Senator from Maryland to continue? And I will examine and see whether I am satisfied with the language of the bill as it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland will proceed.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I propose to strike out in section 1 of the substitute, page 2, in line 5, all after the words "the United States." The reason why I do so is that in my opinion if Congress has the power to go to the Philippine Islands when it is passing a law for the United States and enforce there the exclusion of the Chinese laborer, then the Chinaman who is a citizen of that part of the United States has, under the law and the Constitution also (and Congress has no right under the Constitution to exclude him therefrom), the right to go from one part of the United States into another part of the United States, if it be his pleasure. I contend that under the Constitution, if you apply this law, the inhabitant of the Philippine Islands has as much right to come to California or to the District of Columbia or to Alaska as has the inhabitant of Oklahoma or any other Territory to any other portion of the United States. I therefore move the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "States" in line 5, page 2, it is proposed to strike out:

And to all immigration of Chinese laborers from the island to the mainland territory of the United States, or from one portion of the island territory of the United States to another portion of said island territory: Provided, however, That said laws shall not apply to the transit of Chinese laborers from one island to another island of the same group, and any islands within the jurisdiction of any State or of the district of Alaska shall be considered part of the mainland under this section.

Mr. LODGE. On the point made by the Senator from Maryland, I merely wish to say that when we passed the resolution of annexation of Hawaii we provided that no Chinese should be admitted from Hawaii into the United States. Two years later we passed the organic act, with which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], who had charge of it, is familiar; and in that we provided:

Provided, however, That no Chinese laborer, whether he shall hold such certificate or not, shall be allowed to enter any State, Territory, or district of the United States from the Hawaiian Islands.

The organic act of Hawaii passed the Senate without division and passed the House, and is now the law of the land and has been for some years. The Territory of Hawaii is an organized Territory of the United States. The status of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, left to the determination of Congress, is still undetermined, but we have exercised the power in the case of Hawaii, an organized Territory, to deny to the Chinese in those islands the right to come to the United States.

There is no time in five minutes to enter into a constitutional argument, but Congress has taken that power. It has exerted it in the case of Hawaii, and it has never been questioned. The power that we propose to exercise in regard to the immigration of Chinese from the Philippines to the United States is simply the same power already exercised and agreed to in principle twice by both Houses of Congress. The number of Chinese of course in the Philippine Islands—I do not mean those born there, but Chinese subjects there—is very large, there being three or four times as many as there are in Hawaii.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. President, if I may say just one word in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, I am aware that it has been done so far as Hawaii is concerned, but that does not prove that it is constitutional. The question has never been tested as yet. It has never been questioned. But I desire to say that within ten days after the passage of this bill it will be tested in the courts of the United States, and, in my judgment, the decision of the Supreme Court will be that these men are citizens of the United States and that you have by the passage of this law given them the right to go anywhere within the United States that they please to go.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, in legislation heretofore upon the subject of Chinese exclusion there has been provision made for the Chinese in the country, in reference to whom the legislation is had, obtaining his certificate. Should the substitute proposed by the Senator from Connecticut be adopted and become the law, there is no provision of any kind or character authorizing Chinese persons in our insular possessions to obtain a certificate. Hence I offer an amendment to the proposed substitute. It is a literal copy, except that the term "six months" is changed to "eight months" in sections 12, 13, and 14 of the bill of the committee which we have been discussing here for the last ten days. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following at the end of the amendment:

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of every Chinese laborer rightfully in, and entitled to remain in, any of the insular territory of the United States (Hawaii excepted), at the time of the passage of this act, to obtain within eight months after the passage of this act a certificate of residence in the mainland territory or the insular territory wherein he resides.

To obtain such certificate he shall apply to the appropriate Treasury officer, who, if satisfied on inquiry that the applicant is rightfully within the United States and rightfully within the portion of the territory of the United States where he applies, shall issue to him such certificate without charge. The certificate shall contain the name, age, local residence, and occupation of the applicant, his personal signature, and such other matter as may be required by the rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner-General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. It shall further contain the photograph of the applicant, made at the time and in the manner required by said rules and regulations. A duplicate of the certificate shall be retained by the officer issuing the original, and the duplicate shall contain a duplicate photograph, provided as in the case of the original.

Any person bound under this section to obtain a certificate of residence who shall neglect, fail, or refuse to comply with the provisions hereof, or who, after the expiration of the said eight months, shall be found within the jurisdiction of the United States without such certificate of residence, shall be deemed and adjudged to be unlawfully within the United States, and may be arrested by any officer of the United States and be taken before a United States judge, or before a commissioner of any United States court to be designated by a United States attorney; and it shall be the duty of said judge or said commissioner to order that he be deported from the United States unless he shall clearly establish to the satisfaction of said judge or commissioner that by reason of accident, sickness, or other unavoidable cause he has been unable to procure his certificate, and that, the eight months time limit aside, he is rightfully entitled to such certificate; and if upon such showing it shall appear that he is thus circumstanced, a certificate of residence shall be granted him.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to add that the extension of existing laws would avail nothing so far as this question is concerned from the fact that there is a time limit in all of the laws. The laws originally passed excluding Chinese from this country had a time limit within which the certificate should be obtained from the Department. The same is true in reference to Hawaii. So the mere extension of the existing laws would make no provision whatever for obtaining certificates.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. From what sections of the original bill is the amendment taken?

Mr. MITCHELL. Sections 12, 13, and 14.

Mr. STEWART. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that eight months might be a pretty short time in the Philippines. I suggest a year.

Mr. MITCHELL. A year? I have no objection.

Mr. STEWART. That is more reasonable.

Mr. MITCHELL. The committee made it six months. I made it eight months. Now, I will make it twelve months.

Mr. STEWART. I think I would.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary had not read the whole of the proposed amendment. Does the Senator propose the whole as an amendment?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; I marked it "over," and I thought the Secretary would see it. I ask that the whole amendment be read right now.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Read the whole amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of the amendment the following:

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of every Chinese laborer rightfully in, and entitled to remain in, any of the insular territory of the United States (Hawaii excepted), at the time of the passage of this act, to obtain within one year after the passage of this act a certificate of residence in the mainland territory or the insular territory wherein he resides.

To obtain such certificate he shall apply to the appropriate Treasury officer, who, if satisfied on inquiry that the applicant is rightfully within the United States and rightfully within the portion of the territory of the United States where he applies, shall issue to him such certificate without charge. The certificate shall contain the name, age, local residence, and occupation of the applicant, his personal signature, and such other matter as may be required by the rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner-General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. It shall further contain the photograph of the applicant, made at the time and in the manner required by said rules and regulations. A duplicate of the certificate shall be retained by the officer issuing the original, and the duplicate shall contain a duplicate photograph, provided as in the case of the original.

Any person bound under this section to obtain a certificate of residence who shall neglect, fail, or refuse to comply with the provisions hereof, or who, after the expiration of the said one year, shall be found within the jurisdiction of the United States without such certificate of residence, shall be deemed and adjudged to be unlawfully within the United States, and may be arrested by any officer of the United States and taken before a United States judge, or before a commissioner of any United States court to be designated by a United States attorney; and it shall be the duty of said judge or said commissioner to order that he be deported from the United States unless he shall clearly establish to the satisfaction of said judge or commissioner that by reason of accident, sickness, or other unavoidable cause he has been unable to procure his certificate, and that, the one-year time limit aside, he is rightfully entitled to such certificate; and if upon such showing it shall appear that he is thus circumstanced, a certificate of residence shall be granted him.

No person shall be given a certificate of residence under any section of this act or be entitled to a reissue of any lost certificate of residence who, prior to his application therefor, shall have been convicted of any crime within the jurisdiction of the United States or any State or Territory or insular territory thereof. Any such person, being thus without such certificate, shall be deported.

Immediately after the passage of this act the Commissioner-General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe and enforce all needful rules and regulations for the registration and certifications by this section required, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall appoint the officers for effecting such registration and certifications, authorizing the payment to them of such compensation in the nature of fees, in addition to their salaries as now allowed by law, as he shall deem necessary, not exceeding $1 for every certificate issued.

SEC. 6. That should it appear that any laborer to whom was lawfully issued a certificate of residence under this act has lost such certificate, or that it has been destroyed, he shall be given a new certificate by the appropriate Treasury officer, on establishing to the satisfaction of the United States judge or commissioner before whom he is brought for deportation that the loss or destruction was not in bad faith.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Secretary to stop reading at that point, as he has reached the end of section 13. That should be the end of the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, there is no time in this five minutes' debate to discuss an amendment proposed as this is or to examine the treaty to see how it is affected.

I understand this amendment applies to all citizens who come within the definition of Chinese persons in the bill, as we have it very clearly defined. I think the friends of the strictest policy in framing the committee bill and the friends of the amendment have endeavored to preserve the rights of citizens and persons who have the rights of citizenship anywhere within our dominion, whether they be citizens of the Philippine Islands or of Hawaii, of Chinese descent. The word "Chinese" in the bill is defined, and it includes citizens and anybody else of Chinese descent here or in the Philippine Islands or in Hawaii.

That being true, the bill has endeavored to preserve the rights of citizens. Whether it has done so or not, no one has avowed any purpose to invade those rights. Here is a proposition which provides that if a citizen does not get a certificate from an executive officer, who may withhold it or not as is his will, he shall be arrested. In the first place, it does not provide for any warrant or any judicial proceeding for the arrest, but I suppose that to be implied in the term arrest. Then he is to be taken before a magistrate, and if he has been convicted of any offense he can not stay, although the conviction and sentence for his offense did not include deportation or forfeiture of any right of citizenship.

So you are adding to a conviction already had a further penalty. But he is to be then subject to somebody's determination as to whether he shall have a certification or not. Whether it is the court or a municipal officer or whoever it is is not very clear; but he is to pay certain fees, as I understand, and all those are retained. However, the substance of the objection is that it is a burden which you have no right to put on a citizen.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that there is no such intention whatever. We have no right to do that, of course.

Mr. HOAR. Then some phrase should be inserted so as not to make it apply to citizens.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think to meet the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. HOAR. I do not think the other part of the Senator's amendment is reasonable at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let us take one thing at a time.

Mr. HOAR. Let me say what I have to say now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think another part of the Senator's amendment is reasonable——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina will state it.

Mr. HOAR. But it has the unreasonableness which I attribute to all this general policy, and I do not propose to waste the time of the Senate, one or two men against ninety, with debating that in my five minutes. I have said what I have to say about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish the sentence. I want simply to secure and retain in the bill what is left of reasonableness in it, if I can.

Mr. MITCHELL. In order to meet the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts, I ask leave to modify my amendment. Let the Secretary turn to that portion of the amendment which was section 12 in the bill. After the word "laborer," in line 10, I ask leave to amend the proposed amendment by inserting the words "other than a citizen;" so as to read:

That it shall be the duty of every Chinese laborer other than a citizen rightfully in, and entitled to remain in, etc.

In regard to the other objection of the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator admits that the objection is simply of a class that he would urge against this kind of legislation. I will state that it follows existing law substantially—the law as originally passed in reference to Chinese exclusion to this country, as also the law, I think, in regard to Hawaii.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. President, I believe that the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut extends to all the territory of the United States the prohibition to come into the United States proper. There are regulations and certificates whereby a man who is in may stay in the United States. In Hawaii it was properly arranged by the organic act. There is no prohibition to the Commission in the Philippines to continue as they now have or to adopt some mode of certification or identification. There is no prohibition here against their adopting that method. We need not upon this amendment legislate for those islands. They can, if they desire, adopt any evidence act which secures the right either to a Chinese citizen, for instance, of Hawaii, or a Chinese denizen in the Philippines. No other act of the United States prevents such legislation in the Philippines by the Commission or prevents in Hawaii the passage of any such evidence act. The prohibition is to coming in. The concession is the right of those who are in, and the certification is simply an evidence act, and nobody is prohibited. Any commission there or the Congress hereafter in the Government bill, if you choose, can dispose of that matter.

I therefore hope that the amendment which is here unnecessary may not be added to the very excellent amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Maryland does not quite understand what the effect of the extension of the laws would be. When we passed the organic act for Hawaii, making it territory of the United States, we extended the laws of the United States to those islands, and among other things, we extended the Chinese-exclusion act. If we had extended those acts simply without making any provision for the certification of Chinese residents under those existing laws, as I understand them, every Chinaman in Hawaii would have been liable to deportation, because under the act extended to the Hawaiian Islands he would have had nothing to protect him whatever. Now, we extend the law to all the islands under our jurisdiction, and a Chinaman in the Philippines has no method of avoiding, as I understand it, the deporting clauses of the law which we are now extending by this amendment.

Mr. MCCOMAS. If we are to extend the provisions of the act and, for the first time, the certifications and all, he then has a time within which to get it.

Mr. LODGE. The act carried no certification provision. There was a time limit on it.

Mr. MCCOMAS. There was a time limit, and that time limit has expired. My point is that these acts carry now for the first time to the Philippines, taking them in pari materia the act here with the evidence act of certification, and undoubtedly the supplemental legislation of the local Territorial legislature or of the Philippine Commission now exercising legislative power can extend a certification or other evidence act to preserve a right which is preserved by this general statute.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] will bear me out that there were very careful provisions in that act for the certification of Chinese residents. It is just before the end of the act, the provision about the Chinese. If the Senator has the act there I think I can show it to him.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; the clause referred to by the Senator in the act approved April 30, 1900, is as follows:

SEC. 101. That Chinese in the Hawaiian Islands when this act takes effect may within one year thereafter obtain certificates of residence as required by "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States," approved May 5, 1892, as amended by an act approved November 3, 1893, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States,' approved May 5, 1892," and until the expiration of said year shall not be deemed to be unlawfully in the United States if found therein without such certificates: Provided, however, That no Chinese laborer, whether he shall hold such certificate or not, shall be allowed to enter any State, Territory, or District of the United States from the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. LODGE. That is precisely what I thought. In order to save the Chinese in Hawaii from being held to be unlawfully in the island it was necessary to make a special certification provision in the act. If you extend the same laws in a mass to the Philippine Islands, you leave the Philippine Chinese in precisely the same position that you would have left the Hawaiian Chinese if you had not made a specific provision to enable them to get certificates of residence.

Mr. MITCHELL. And every one could be deported.

Mr. LODGE. Every one of them would be liable to be deported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No Senator can speak more than once.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know to whom the Chair refers.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to a word or two in his amendment which cause me a little trouble and which, if enacted, would be incapable of enforcement. It speaks of the United States judge and United States court commissioner in the Philippine Islands. I do not know that there is any United States judge or any United States court commissioner in the Philippines. There is in Hawaii, of course.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to the Senator from Wisconsin that I had not forgotten that, and I had intended to follow this amendment, if adopted, by the following:

That in any insular territory of the United States where the United States has not established Federal courts and has not provided Federal marshals the judicial functions vested in United States judges shall be vested in judges of the highest local courts in such territory, and the executive functions vested in United States attorneys and marshals shall be vested in the corresponding local officers in such territory.

Mr. SPOONER. What about the United States commissioner and subordinate judicial officials?

Mr. MITCHELL. They have no commissioner there.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think we have any commissioners in the Philippine Islands. I do not know of any except the Commission that governs the islands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not agree to it. It is an amendment which can not be carefully considered now. I do not think it is necessary, and I hope the Senate will not agree to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. QUAY. I ask that the amendment be again read.

Mr. CULLOM. It is very long.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a very long amendment.

Mr. QUAY. I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent to say one word before the vote is taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent to say one word. [Laughter.] Is there objection? The Chairs none.

Mr. MITCHELL. All right. I thank the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin will state his point of order.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has exhausted his privilege. [Laughter.]

Mr. MITCHELL. I simply want to state to the Senate, Mr. President, and to those Senators who are the friends of the Chinese, if there are any such here, who think the legislation proposed by the Committee on Immigration is too drastic, that this amendment is as much in the interest of the Chinese in our insular territory as in the interest of the Government. The fact is, if this amendment is not adopted to the bill, and the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut is adopted and becomes the law, there is nothing in the way of the deportation of every Chinaman in the Philippine Islands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], but that pair has been transferred to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. I will not announce it again. I vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 41, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—41.

Allison,	Clark, Mont.	Heitfeld,	Mitchell,
Bacon,	Clay,	Jones, Ark.	Money,

Daniel,	Dryden,	McEnery,

So Mr. MITCHELL's amendment to the amendment of Mr. PLATT of Connecticut was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I call attention to this language in section 1, lines 7 and 8, "so far as the same is not inconsistent with treaty obligations now existing." It seems to me that it would be rather a difficult thing for an administrative officer to determine that question, which has been discussed here a good deal; and there is a difference of opinion whether the laws which have heretofore been passed are in conflict with the treaty obligations now existing. If I understand the Senator's amendment aright, unless some satisfactory explanation be given, I shall move to strike out, in lines 7 and 8, on the first page of the amendment, the words "so far as the same is not inconsistent with treaty obligations now existing."

Mr. HOAR. May I make a suggestion to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. This is not the enactment of a new law; it is simply to continue existing laws in force.

Mr. STEWART. I know it is.

Mr. HOAR. Of course, when you continue all the laws now in force, those who administer them have to determine what the law is and what it means, and whether an earlier law is modified by a later law. That is only doing in regard to a treaty what is being done continually in regard to a statute. I do not see any difference in the cases.

Mr. STEWART. I want the laws now existing to be in force, so that there will not be any conflict with the treaty. Certainly this will be the last law, and it will be the only law upon the subject.

Mr. HOAR. It would be exactly the same thing if we should use the language "all laws now in force."

Mr. STEWART. "So far as they are not inconsistent with the treaty." Now, if we say "all the laws now in force," some of the Chinese treaties are now in force and some laws are now in force—that will be all there is of it.

Mr. HOAR. "All laws now in force."

Mr. STEWART. If you put in the words "all laws now in force"——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator misapprehends my point. If anything in the proposed law is inconsistent with and is later than the law now in force, or if the treaty be inconsistent with and earlier than the law, of course the proposed law, when enacted, will be in force. If it be not inconsistent with treaty obligations now existing, then the treaty obligations will continue in force. So the language requires exactly the same exercise of judgment on the part of the officials, whether the words referred to are in or out of the bill.

Mr. STEWART. If it is exactly the same thing whether they are in or out, let us have them out. I think their retention makes the meaning more obscure. I move to strike the words out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada moves an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 1, line 7, after the word "eighty-eight," it is proposed to strike out:

So far as the same is not inconsistent with treaty obligations now existing.

Mr. HOAR. If I may be allowed, I move to strike out of the Senator's amendment the words "now existing."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What is the effect of that amendment, Mr. President?

Mr. HOAR. All I wish to say is that if you do not strike out those words, you reenact the law of 1888, without any regard to whether the treaty affects it or not.

Mr. STEWART. That is what I want to know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment, as it has now been perfected, which has been offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] as a substitute for the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, may I inquire if the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] offered the amendment which he said he would offer?

Mr. LODGE. He did not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon did not offer his amendment.

Mr. LODGE. That amendment can be added subsequently.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendmant of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] as it has been amended.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KEAN (when Mr. DRYDEN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. DRYDEN] is paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS]. If my colleague were present, he would vote in favor of the substitute.

Mr. HEITFELD (when the name of Mr. DUBOIS was called). I again announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. DUBOIS] with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I again announce the transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when Mr. MASON'S name was called). The junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] desired it to be understood that he would vote for the substitute for the original bill if he were present. I have been unable to secure a pair for him on this question.

YEAS—48.

So the amendment offered by Mr. PLATT of Connecticut as a substitute for the bill reported by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the amendment which was suggested a few minutes ago, which I send to the desk. It is to come in at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add as section 6 the following:

That in any insular territory of the United States where the United States has not established Federal courts and has not provided Federal marshals the judicial functions vested in United States judges shall be vested in judges of the highest local courts in such territory, and the executive functions vested in United States attorneys and marshals shall be vested in the corresponding local officers in such territory.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, the previous amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] having been adopted on a vote of the Senate, it is necessary, I think, that this amendment should also be adopted to perfect it.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me, would it not be better in a statute to say "United States courts" and "United States marshals" instead of Federal courts and Federal marshals?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it would. I will modify the amendment in that way.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon, as modified, to the substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the two amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, how is there more than one amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One amendment has just been made. The substitute was an amendment, and there has been one amendment made since.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. To the substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. As I understood it, the last amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] became a part of the substitute which I had offered.

Mr. HALE. There was only one amendment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There was only one amendment.

Mr. CARMACK. I offer an amendment. On page 2, line 5, after the word "laborers," I move to insert "not citizens of the United States." That is the amendment adopted to the main bill, for which a substitute has now been agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There is no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, without objection, will be agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let us have the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut, who is now in charge of the bill, I presume, whether it is his intention to attach the bill, as agreed, to to the House bill; that is, to substitute it for the House bill?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not think it is either parliamentary or wise to do so. I think we can pass this bill; it will go to the House; the House will do what they please with it; of course, they will substitute their bill for it, and then the bill will go into conference. I do not think it makes any difference——

Mr. MITCHELL. It only delays matters.

Mr. TELLER. I do not intend to detain the Senate by any remarks on this bill. I wish to say that, as a friend of legislation of this kind, I am not at all satisfied with this bill. I am going to vote for it, because it is the best thing I can do. It is not such a bill as we ought to pass; it is not such a bill as the real friends of Chinese exclusion desire; but I will vote for it as better, perhaps, than nothing.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, like the Senator from Colorado, I will vote for this bill, but I am not satisfied with it. I ask its friends to recommit it, in order to provide us with a bill with respect to which we will know what we are voting for. I am as good a friend of labor as there is in the United States, and I am in favor of protecting it, but we ought to be careful. I believe the proper thing to do with this bill is to recommit it and appoint another day upon which to vote on it. The friends of the measure ought to make that motion. I do not want to take the lead in doing so, but that is what ought to be done.

I am now and have always been opposed to Chinese immigration, because I consider it a menace to the American wage-earner. I favor American labor and everything that will promote its best interests. I could not support the bill reported by the committee in its present shape, because its provisions are doubtful. They do not go far enough in the interest of American labor to suit me. Besides, I am advised that it violates our treaty obligations, which as a nation we can not afford to do.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think this bill and this debate indicate a great progress in sentiment. The sentiment of the country has passed, certainly so far as it is represented by a majority of the Senate, the stage, if it ever was in it, of a reckless seeking to accomplish the result of Chinese exclusion without regard to constitutional restraints, treaty obligations, or moral duties. There was in some quarters, as it seemed to me, in olden times, a disregard of all these restraints, certainly in the press, certainly in the harangues which were made to excited crowds in various parts of the country. Among other I can remember a visit of the apostle of Chinese exclusion to Boston and an address by him on the Boston Common which indicated that spirit.

Now, that has gone largely, and the Senate has discussed this question with a temporate desire on the part of all classes and all Senators, whatever ways of thinking they have, to do what seemed to them for the benefit of labor, the quality of the citizenship of this country in a moderate and constitutional fashion.

But I can not agree with the principle upon which this legislation or any legislation on the subject which we have had in the country since 1870 rests. I feel bound to enter a protest. I believe that everything in the way of Chinese exclusion can be accomplished by reasonable, practical, and wise measures which will not involve the principle of striking at labor because it is labor, and will not involve the principle of striking at any class of human beings merely because of race, without regard to the personal and individual worth of the man struck at. I hold that every human soul has its rights, dependent upon its individual personal worth and not dependent upon color or race, and that all races, all colors, all nationalities contain persons entitled to be recognized everywhere they go on the face of the earth as the equals of every other man.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore rapped with his gavel.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RAWLINS. Is it in order now to move to substitute the House bill on the Calendar——

Mr. HOAR. Have I not the right to finish my remarks, if I have the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts had consumed his five minutes.

Mr. HOAR. I was not aware of that. I had no notice of it. I should like to finish my sentence.

As this bill violates that principle, in my judgment, I am bound to record my protest, if I stand alone.

Mr. RAWLINS. If it be in order, I move to substitute the House bill, which is now on the Calendar, for the bill which is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has passed beyond the stage of amendment. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. PATTERSON. There is an amendment which I offered dangling somewhere in the Chamber, but I do not know where. I desire to withdraw it, so that the RECORD at least will be clear.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado withdraws his amendment. The Chair had forgotten that there was one pending. The question is, Shall the bill pass? The Secretary will call the roll.

The yeas and nays were taken; and resulted—yeas 76, nays 1; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of the civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes. I merely wish to have it made the unfinished business, and then I will yield for an executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill providing civil government for the Philippine Archipelago.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12765); and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed on Friday at 3 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12765; and pending that, also asks unanimous consent that general debate upon this bill be closed on Friday next at 3 o'clock p. m. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. I would like to ask my colleague if it would not be possible to incorporate with his request a proposition to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow and Friday.

Mr. PAYNE. I would have no objection to that myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York amends his request, and asks that the sessions of the House to-morrow and Friday commence at 11 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement. Inasmuch as there has been some division on this side of the House as well as on the other side on this proposition, I want to make this statement, Mr. Speaker. I shall not object to this request, but I want to notify all gentlemen on this side of my position, because if any other gentleman desires to object he may do so. Now, Mr. Speaker, when this bill was taken up the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] asked to close this general debate—it was taken up on Tuesday of last week—he asked to close general debate——

Mr. PAYNE. On Friday of last week.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee (continuing). On Friday of last week, as I remember. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON], one of the strongest opposers of the bill on this side of the House, suggested to him to close it on yesterday. That was Tuesday—one week of debate—and to that the gentleman from New York himself objected.

Mr. PAYNE. I wish right there to say——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am not finding fault. So that we have had a longer time than the gentleman from Louisiana asked for the general debate. Now, as I understand it, the gentleman comes and is willing to continue debate until Friday evening at 3 o'clock. In order that all gentlemen may understand it, I make this statement, and so far as I am concerned, I am satisfied with the general debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I object to the request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that general debate close on Friday at 3 o'clock, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that general debate close on Friday at 3 o'clock, and on that demands the previous question.

The question on ordering the previous question was put; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Several MEMBERS. Division!

Mr. BARTLETT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. I desire to know whether this is on the previous question, or what is it on?

The SPEAKER. The vote is on ordering the previous question.

The House divided; and the Speaker announced 103 in the affirmative.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Can I not withdraw the objection?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain a parliamentary inquiry pending a vote.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman states he wishes to withdraw his objection, and if that is done it will obviate the whole trouble.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must call the attention of the House to the fact that it is in the midst of a vote, and the gentleman will have to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings be vacated and that the suggestion made by the gentleman from New York be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the present proceedings be vacated and that the request of the gentleman from New York be agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Those opposed to ordering the previous question will rise. Ninety-nine votes in the negative. On this question the yeas are 103 and the nays 99. The ayes have it, and the previous question is ordered.

The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to limit general debate to 3 o'clock p. m. on Friday next.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAY) there were ayes 107, noes 120.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 124, answered "present" 8, not voting 70; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. PAYNE was agreed to.

The following pairs were announced:

For the session:

Mr. KAHN with Mr. BELMONT.

Mr. BOREING with Mr. TRIMBLE.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. BENTON.

Mr. WRIGHT with Mr. HALL.

Until further notice:

Mr. VAN VOORHIS with Mr. GORDON.

Mr. CAPRON with Mr. JETT.

Mr. EDDY with Mr. SHEPPARD.

Mr. SHOWALTER with Mr. SLAYDEN.

Mr. STEELE with Mr. COOPER of Texas.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts with Mr. NAPHEN.

Mr. JACK with Mr. FINLEY.

Mr. BABCOCK with Mr. CUMMINGS.

Mr. HEDGE with Mr. SMALL.

For this day:

Mr. HAUGEN with Mr. SALMON.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts with Mr. RANDELL of Texas.

Mr. HOPKINS with Mr. LESTER.

Mr. GILL with Mr. LATIMER.

Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. RUPPERT.

Mr. COUSINS with Mr. BELLAMY.

Mr. REEDER with Mr. HENRY of Texas.

Mr. CONNELL with Mr. WOOTEN.

Mr. GRAHAM with Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN.

Mr. DOVENER with Mr. NEWLANDS.

Mr. DRAPER with Mr. RYAN.

Mr. HILDEBRANT with Mr. SULZER.

Mr. RUMPLE with Mr. GOLDFOGLE.

Mr. BURK of Pennsylvania with Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER with Mr. DE GRAFFENREID.

For this vote:

Mr. EVANS with Mr. LASSITER.

Mr. DAYTON with Mr. GLENN.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH with Mr. SHAFROTH.

Mr. LOVERING with Mr. LEWIS of Georgia.

On this bill except final passage:

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts with Mr. THAYER.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no" on the roll call. I find I am announced as paired. I therefore withdraw my vote and wish to be recorded as "present."

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. As I am paired with my colleague, Mr. GORDON, who is absent this morning, I desire to withdraw my vote and be recorded as "present."

Mr. CAPRON. Being paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. JETT, I wish to withdraw my vote and be recorded "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

HOUR OF MEETING FOR NEXT TWO DAYS.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the House meet to-morrow and Friday at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow was set apart by unanimous consent for the business of the Committee on War Claims. In order to obviate any parliamentary difficulty, and so that the debate on the pending bill may go on, I ask that next Tuesday be substituted for business of our committee.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on War Claims [Mr. MAHON] asks that next Tuesday be set apart for the consideration of business from that committee. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

RECIPROCITY WITH CUBA.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 12765.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12765) to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that in view of the limitation which the House has put upon debate on this bill, and in consideration of the number of gentlemen who have asked an opportunity to speak, it will be impossible for the Chair to recognize any gentleman for an hour. If the time that the Chair may allot to any of the various gentlemen who are to speak should be extended, it must be with the distinct understanding that the extension will probably exclude some member from the privilege of speaking who would otherwise be enabled to speak. Should extensions of time be asked, it will be for each member to understand that the extension in favor of one gentleman may shut out some other. The Chair thinks it fair to make this statement before the debate begins, so that every member of the House may act accordingly. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] is recognized for forty-five minutes.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, by way of preface to my remarks, and in order that my attitude toward the existing tariff law may not be misconstrued or misunderstood here or elsewhere, I desire to say to the committee that I am a strong and I trust a consistent believer in the theory of protecting against the competition of foreign products and foreign labor every American industry, manufacturer, or laborer in need of protection. If a high rate of duty is necessary to accomplish this, I am for the high rate; if a low rate of duty will serve the purpose, I am for the low rate. If the free entry of any product or article will not diminish American wages or restrict the American production of that article, I am for placing that product or article upon the free list and giving the benefit of lower prices to the many rather than imposing a tariff on it for the benefit of the few who invariably profit by such conditions. So much for my personal views and attitude on the policy of protection.

Almost from the fall of the Speaker's gavel at the beginning of this session of Congress our ears have been assailed with frantic appeals for action in behalf of poor, distressed Cuba. Those appeals have come from the corridor, the lobby, the committee room, the floor of the House, the press of the country, and have grown more and more frantic as the days have passed, until the cry is now almost hysterical. Certain gentlemen on the floor of this House and many newspapers throughout the country are greatly agitated and disturbed over the financial and physical condition of our wards in the island of Cuba; and they propose to cut our tariff in order that those wards may be insured peace, plenty, prosperity, and consequent happiness.

I have listened to all these arguments, entreaties, appeals, and supplications with close interest, fondly hoping that I might hear some faint, feeble word of encouragement held out to our own people along the line of tariff reduction in their interest. But thus far I have strained my ear drums in vain. Apparently the programme is to help Porto Rico, help Hawaii, help the Philippines, help Cuba, help everybody on God's green footstool except the people unfortunate enough to live in the United States. For them the Dingley rates, now and forever.

The Dingley bill was a wonderfully conceived piece of constructive legislation, and has accomplished truly wonderful results in restoring prosperity to a country that had been prostrated in an attempt to conform itself to Democratic notions of and experiments on a tariff policy. But great as was that bill and marvelous as were the results obtained under its provisions, neither its greatness nor its results are sufficient to make of it a deity before whom the American people must forever bow their heads nor dare lift their eyes to the face of their god, much less to question his imperious will.

At its inception the Dingley bill was far from perfect, and was so admitted by some of its warmest friends. The rates imposed by many of its schedules were much higher than were necessary to adequately protect American capital and labor, and in one instance at least, which I shall later point out, no duty whatever should have been imposed. The article should have remained on the free list, where it had been from the foundation of the Government, except for a period of about thirty years between 1842 and 1872. I refer to the tariff on hides of cattle, which, so far as concerns both the manufacturer and workman of the United States, are and always must be classed as raw material. During this great outburst of generosity on the part of Congress toward the people of Cuba I propose to test Congressional magnanimity toward good, plain, honest, everyday American citizens by coupling with our gift to Cuba a wee, little, tiny crumb of comfort to our own people, which is embodied in an amendment to the pending bill which at the proper time I shall offer and which I now send to the desk to be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add a new paragraph—

"SEC. 2. That on and after the passage of this act the raw or uncured hides of cattle, whether the same be dry, salted, or pickled, shall, when imported, be exempt from duty.

"Paragraph 437, Schedule N, of the act entitled 'An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States,' approved July 24, 1897, is hereby repealed."

Mr. ROBERTS. When the bill now under consideration and discussion by the committee came before the House a week ago last Tuesday, on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the Speaker of this House twice ruled that it was a bill affecting the revenues, and as such gained its privileged status. I assume the chairman of this committee, himself a sound and able parliamentarian, will follow the precedent established by our distinguished and learned Speaker, whose knowledge of parliamentary law and procedure is second to that of none of his illustrious predecessors, and if called upon to rule on that question will rule that, this being a bill affecting the revenues, any amendment that affects the revenues will be in order. Upon this assumption I shall address the remainder of my remarks to reasons why the amendment I shall offer later should be adopted.

A little history as to the tariff on hides may not be out of place at this point. From the foundation of the Government down to the year 1842 no one ever thought of placing a duty on hides. In that year, by reason of a deficit in the Treasury, brought about by Executive veto of two tariff bills, it became necessary to raise money to cover that deficit, and so for the first time hides were taxed the enormous rate of 5 per cent ad valorem. That tax remained until 1857, when if was reduced to 4 per cent, and it continued at 4 per cent until March, 1861, when it was restored to 5 per cent. Six months later, in August, 1861, when it became necessary to raise money to carry on our great civil war, the duty was increased to 10 per cent ad valorem. That was a time when everything in sight was taxed, and when light and air would have been taxed could they have been measured or their value computed.

The duty remained at 10 per cent from 1861, owing to the exigencies of the Government, until 1872, when hides were again placed on the free list.

There were many tariff revisions subsequent to that of 1872, among them the McKinley bill, which had protection for its corner stone, but in none of those bills was a penny of tariff levied on hides.

In 1897 it was proposed to once more tax hides and every other description of skins except fur skins 25 per cent ad valorem; but when the smoke of battle had cleared away it was discovered that all other skins had escaped the Dingley drag net except hides of cattle, and they were entangled in its meshes with a duty of 15 per cent ad valorem—a duty three times greater than when the country needed money to make up a deficit in the Treasury, and 50 per cent greater than when the country was resorting to every expedient to raise money to carry on our great civil war.

Prior to 1897 hides and every description of skins had been on the free list seventy-eight years in all, and for about thirty years has been taxed from 4 to 10 per cent. When taxed at all, hides and all manner of skins were taxed equally. The tax bore on all alike. There was no discrimination. The Dingley bill was the first legislation in the history of the United States to make a distinction between hides of cattle and hides of other animals, taxing the former and leaving the latter on the free list where all should have been left. Why was this unjust discrimination made? Was it to produce revenue? Let us see. Under the operations of this bill there have been imported into the United States in the last four years hides and skins to the value of $185,212,686. Of this amount $123,910,121 or over two-thirds in value came in free of duty, leaving $61,300,565 upon which a 15 per cent tariff was levied.

Clearly hides of cattle were not singled out for their revenue-producing capacity. Was it to protect the American producer of hides and skins? If so, why was not the American producer of goatskins, sheepskins, calfskins, pigskins, horsehides, and every other kind of skins taken under the mantle of protection that was thrown around the producer of cattle hides? Perhaps the production of hides of cattle was thought to be an infant industry or one that was struggling to get along and needed the fostering care of a high tariff rate. Let us examine that proposition for a moment. Taking the period of 1893 to 1900, both inclusive, we find upon examination of the official report of the secretary of the Union Stock Yard at Chicago that native steers brought the highest price during those eight years, in December, 1899, when they sold for $7.40 per hundredweight on the hoof, and during that same month green salted hides sold at 14 cents per pound, the top-notch price for that eight-year period. Assuming the average weight of a steer to be 1,500 pounds, the animal was then worth $111. Assuming its hide to weigh 100 pounds, that was worth $14, or a trifle less than one-eighth of the market price of the steer.

Take another instance: In June, 1894, when steers, live weight, brought but $5 per hundred pounds and hides 5½ cents per pound. At these figures a 1,500-pound steer was worth $75 and his hide $5.25, or less than one-fifteenth of the entire value of the animal.

These figures not only refute any contention that the production of cattle hides is an industry which needs and should have protection, but they prove most clearly and convincingly that hides of cattle are a by-product of the beef business, and being a by-product are not entitled to any measure of protection whatever. It is no part or parcel of the true policy of protection to protect the by-products of an established industry, especially when that industry is already amply protected from foreign competition. Then why enhance the price by a tariff, and thus tax our people on an article the production of which is not an industry but must always remain a mere side issue, and incident of a vast business that is already so heavily protected it can sell its wares to aliens across the sea cheaper than to our own people?

When the Dingley bill was being framed it was vigorously contended that the proposed tariff on hides was in the interest of and would benefit the farmer and stock raiser, and upon that theory, and that alone, the tax was imposed. If that contention had been true when it was made, or had it proven to be true under the operations of the bill, there would be some foundation for the retention of the tariff.

That it was thought to be true when the bill was under discussion I shall not dispute, but I most emphatically deny that the farmer or stockman, except in two contingencies, to which I shall refer, receives one iota of benefit from this tariff.

Cattle are not raised in this country for their hides. Every schoolboy knows that. They never have been, and never will be, raised for that purpose, but must always be raised solely because of their value as a food product. A tariff which might add $1.50 or $2 to the value of a hide, which is but a fifteenth of the market price of the animal, is no more incentive to the production of hides than is the rising and setting of the sun. To increase the output of hides it would be necessary to impose a tariff high enough to make the hide the principal element of value and the meat a by-product. Then, and then only, would the hide industry be stimulated and cattle be raised for their hides.

The farmer and the stockman sell their beeves at live weight, or "on the hoof," as it is termed in the trade. If the hide was an element in determining the price to be paid for beef animals, there would be some relation between the market prices of steers on the hoof and hides. When the price of steers went up the price of hides would advance also, and in proportion as is the weight of the hide to that of the live animal. When the price of steers went down the price of hides would take a relative drop. But examination of the quotations before referred to, which are tabulated by months and which I shall incorporate in my remarks without reading in detail, discloses the contrary to be the case.

During the eight years covered by this table there is hardly an exception to the rule that hides were falling when steers on the hoof were advancing, and when the market price of steers was falling the price of hides was advancing, proving conclusively that the hide was not a factor in fixing the price of the animal. And if the hide does not increase the price of the steer, it is absolutely certain the tariff on the hide does not benefit the man who sells the steer, but does inure to the benefit of the man who sells the hide after it is taken from the steer, and to him alone.

The farmer who loses a beeve by sickness or who slaughters one for food can sell the skin for a price 15 per cent more than he could get if there was no tariff on hides. The stockman losing a few steers by blizzards or other causes, if he can find and skin the bodies, gets the benefit of the tariff on hides, and these, I reiterate, are the only instances where the farmer or stockman receives any benefit, direct or indirect, from that tariff. If anyone believes the hide on a steer influences the market price of the animal, let him ponder on these figures. The prices I quote are for steers live weight per hundred pounds and for hides per single pound.

Here are nine instances—five before the Dingley tariff law with hides on the free list, and four subsequent to the passage of that law, which taxed hides 15 per cent ad valorem—when steers in each case were $6 per 100 pounds on the hoof, and the price of hides ranged from 6¼ to 13 cents per pound.

Once before the Dingley law, in June, 1895, and once after it, in November, 1900, with steers at $6, the price of hides was the same, to wit, 13 cents per pound. Let us select a few cases where the price of hides was the same and see what relation that bore to the price of live steers.

Here are six instances, one before and five since the Dingley bill, when hides were 12½ cents per pound, and in only two cases—July, 1898, and May, 1899, both under the operations of that law—was the price of steers the same.

In the light of these facts, will anyone seriously contend that the hide is any appreciable factor in fixing the price the farmer or cattle raiser will get for his beeves? And having these tables in mind, who can be deceived further by the contention that the tariff on hides benefits the farmer or the stockman of the West?

If the inutility of this tariff as a revenue producer or as a protection to American farmers were all that could be alleged against it, these reasons alone would warrant its immediate repeal. Unfortunately for the country these are but minor and trivial evils compared with the great wrong and injustice that is being perpetrated upon the people by this tariff on hides. Two great industries—leather and boots and shoes—and every man, woman, and child in the United States wearing shoes are directly affected by it, and its burden fall heaviest upon those the least able to bear it, as I shall later demonstrate. That the committee may realize the magnitude of the financial interests and the number of working people affected, I beg to submit a few statistics obtained from a preliminary report of the Twelfth Census:

These statistics relate only to the production of tanned, curried, and finished leather and the factory product of boots and shoes, and do not include belting and hose leather, leather goods, trunks, valises, pocketbooks, saddlery, harnesses, gloves, and mittens, or cut stock, uppers, and custom work, and boot and shoe findings in the latter industry. In the single State of Massachusetts, where I have been able to get the figures, these items of themselves represent 929 establishments with $11,173,082 of capital, giving employment to 9,312 persons, paying annual wages amounting to $3,881,916 and producing goods valued at $31,242,391. These figures, I repeat, relate only to side issues of the leather and boot and shoe industries in a single State.

To keep the thousands of establishments, with their hundreds of thousands of operatives, employed we must have hides, and the domestic supply is wholly inadequate to meet the demands, either as to quantity or quality. The domestic green-salted hide can not, in many instances, take the place of the foreign dry hide, even were the annual output sufficient for that purpose; and the leather men are forced in consequence to import enormous quantities of the latter—in some years as high as 163,000,000 pounds. The duty on hides not only increases the cost of these hides by 15 per cent, but it also adds that same percentage of cost to every domestic hide. One of three things must naturally follow: Either the profits of the manufacturer are reduced, the wage-earning power of the employee curtailed, or the cost of the manufactured product is enhanced to the consumer.

So far as the boot and shoe industry is concerned I am convinced all three of these results have followed, and with the exception of the tanners and their employees I think the same is true of the leather industry. From the statistics before quoted it will be seen that our factories turn out annually 213,652,014 pairs of boots, shoes, and slippers. One might think it would keep the 1,600 establishments engaged in this business pretty busy during the twelve months. Such is not the case, however. This entire output, vast as it is, can be turned out, according to the estimate of experts, in from six to eight months, if the factories were to run full time. With this four or six months of enforced idleness for plant and operative fully employed, it is axiomatic that the employer would make greater profit and the employee receive more wages.

Can this be done? I answer, emphatically, yes. Remove the tariff handicap now restraining our shoe manufacturers in the race for the world's markets and they will soon gain enough foreign trade to keep their factories busy the year round. This will largely increase the wages of the shoe operatives, giving them more money to spend, and so making them larger consumers of the products of other industries, while at the same time it will give a direct and perceptible benefit to the farmer and stock raiser in creating a greater demand and therefore a more steady market for the hides he produces.

A moment ago I spoke of the tariff on hides being a handicap on the shoe manufacturer when seeking foreign markets. It is a handicap and a serious one in a business where the net profit is figured in pennies per pair as it is in the boot and shoe industry. The Dingley bill provides a rebate of the tariff if the imported hide after being tanned is subsequently exported. That is a good thing for the tanners, as it gives American labor the benefit of the wages for tanning, but a repeal of the tariff would in no wise affect the tanners. Just as many hides would be tanned under free entry as under a duty.

The tariff is disastrous, however, to the shoe man who seeks to export his product, for it increases the cost 15 per cent of all leather made from cattle hides which enters into the make-up of his goods. It is disastrous in another way. The tanner of foreign hides in this country, by virtue of the drawback clause, can sell leather to the foreign shoe manufacturer at from 10 to 12 per cent less, according to the amount of freight charges he must pay, than he can to the American, who must compete with that foreign manufacturer in the world's markets. In 1900 we exported boots and shoes to the value of $4,274,174—a mere drop, however, in the total output of our factories, and an infinitesimally small per cent of their capacity. This has been done by American perseverance, pluck, and enterprise despite the higher cost of materials to our manufacturers.

Give us somewhere near an equal show with the foreigner in the cost of leather and the superior skill of American labor will soon place in all the markets of Europe a shoe that can not be surpassed in the world for beauty, finish, and durability.

Some one may say, "Does not the drawback apply to the imported leather that goes into the exported shoe?" Oh, yes; but all exported shoes are not made from imported leather. They may be, and doubtless are, made partly from imported and partly from domestic leather. As there are from 15 to 25 parts or pieces in a shoe, it is absolutely impossible in practice to keep track of the leather from which the shoe is made, for the purpose of getting the drawback on that which was imported. So the drawback feature is of no benefit to the manufacturer, but must always remain a detriment, as long as the duty remains on hides, inasmuch as it is in practical effect that much protection to the foreign manufacturer. Not only is this true of the boot and shoe industry, but also of the belting, trunk, saddle, and harness men who are seeking a foreign outlet for their wares.

Whoever thought the Dingley tariff law would ever operate to protect a foreign manufacturer against the competition of his American rival? Let the champions of the "let-well-enough-alone" policy on this floor ponder on that feature of their sacred ultra high-tariff schedules, and see if their better judgment does not tell them the time is now at hand when the hide schedule should be revised in the interest of American manufacturers and American wage earners and no longer kept on the statute books to protect our foreign rivals.

There is another feature of this tariff on hides not yet touched upon—that is, its effect upon the American consumer, the general public, who buy the two hundred and odd millions of pairs of shoes we make each year. I stated some time ago this tariff bore the heaviest on those the least able to stand it.

Careful and conservative estimates of the added cost by reason of the tariff have been made, and these show the increased cost, solely because of the tariff, to be from 2 cents per pair on women's and men's high-grade shoes, up to 12 and 15 cents per pair on the coarsest, heaviest grades worn by workingmen and farmers, the cost increasing in the proportion of heavy leather in the boot or shoe. If the operation of a tariff schedule makes any discrimination in the burden it imposes, it should be in favor of those who have the least means rather than in favor of the rich. Yet here is a case where the rich man, who can buy shoes of the finest grade, having in them the minimum of duty-affected leather, pays less duty increase per pair, although he may pay five or ten or fifteen times more for the shoes, than does the man whose necessities and purse compel him to purchase the coarser grades.

A gentleman's shoe costing, say, $5 or $10 will have in it leather which has been increased in price by the tariff probably about 4 or 5 cents. The purchaser of that shoe contributes to "the big six," familiarly known as the beef trust, for that is the sponge which is absorbing this 15 per cent tariff, and not the stock raiser or farmer, about 1 cent on each dollar expended.

I have been told by one claiming to know that the heavy, coarse shoes worn by workmen in the rolling mills at Pittsburg sold for $1 per pair before the Dingley bill. They are made entirely of leather affected by the tariff, and now sell for $1.15 per pair. The iron worker contributes to the trust almost 15 cents on each dollar invested in shoes, and recently the trust, thinking it was not being fairly treated by the public, has shoved up the price of beef, and is now wringing from rich and poor alike some 2 to 5 cents additional on each pound of beef it sells, How long, think you, "Mr. Let-well-enough-alone," will the American people stand a tariff schedule operating in this manner and enriching no one but the beef trust? Is it not better to remedy that injustice now rather than to wait until they are so thoroughly exasperated they will rise in their might and sweep the whole protective fabric out of existence?

I have said heretofore the farmer gets no benefit from this tariff on hides; but admitting for argument the whole 15 per cent goes directly into his pocket and gives him that much more for every beeve he sells, is he as well off under the tariff as he would be under free entry of hides? If every farmer in the United States sells annually one beef animal, for which he gets the full benefit of the tariff on hides, he will have about $1.50 to carry to the credit side of his ledger. Then let him figure out and carry to the debit side the added cost of the boots he buys for himself, his wife, and children, the harness and saddles he must purchase, and all other manufactures of leather he uses, and it will not take him very long to see that his account does not balance. There is altogether too much on the debit side, and he finds that every dollar of protection he is getting on hides is costing him not less than $3 to obtain.

In this connection I wish to read an extract from a letter sent to a member of this body by a constituent:

The farmers of Minnesota average to kill one beef "critter" annually. The duty of 15 per cent adds to the value of the hide at present market price about 60 cents. The farmer, on an average, consumes annually about $70 worth of shoes and harness, at an increased cost of about 8 per cent, or $5.60. So you can see how much benefit he receives when he has to pay $5.60 to make 60 cents. The tanner, shoe manufacturer, and harness maker require more capital to run their business, so they don't want it. The farmer don't want it, the laborer don't want it, you don't want it; nobody but the packer wants it, so let's repeal and no longer handicap one of the great industries of the country.

This sort of protection, if applied to all the needs of the farmer, would soon land him in the poorhouse. When he realizes how the hide tariff is working and finds that his share of profits under it is purely theoretical, that he is getting the shadow and not the substance, and he is beginning to realize it, how much longer will he submit to the exactions of the beef trust?

Mr. Chairman, in whatever aspect this tariff on hides may be viewed, it is a delusion, a snare, and a fraud upon the American people. I say this not as a free trader or tariff reformer, but as a protectionist who wants to see the true policy of protection upheld and sustained to the end, that it may continue to be the mainspring of our national progress and prosperity. Such perversion of a sound and wise economic policy as is shown by the imposition and continuance of this tariff on hides can but serve to shatter the faith of the people in protection and bring the whole structure down in ruins about our heads.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk and ask to have read a letter written twelve years ago.

WASHINGTON, April 10, 1890.

DEAR MR. MCKINLEY: It is a great mistake to take hides from the free list, where they have been for so many years. It is a slap in the face to the South Americans with whom we are trying to enlarge our trade. It will benefit the farmer by adding 5 to 8 per cent to the price of his children's shoes. It will yield a profit to the butcher only—the last man that needs it. The movement is injudicious from beginning to end, in every form and phase. Pray stop it before it sees light. Such movements as this for protection will protect the Republican party into a speedy retirement.

Yours, hastily,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

Hon. WILLIAM MCKINLEY,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. ROBERTS. No better or more concise epitome of the argument against a tariff on hides has ever been made. Every word and every line of it are as true to-day as when penned. I believe that letter prevented the placing of a duty on hides in the McKinley bill. William McKinley had the wisdom to see the injustice of such a tariff and the moral strength to resist the enormous pressure for its imposition. Let us profit by his wisdom, the profoundness of which has been amply demonstrated by the experience of the last five years, and, emulating his moral courage and grandeur, strike off from the statute books this useless and unjust tariff. Let us relieve the farmers and laborers of an unnecessary burden and give to the American manufacturer of shoes and leather goods a fair field with manufacturers of other wares in the grand struggle for foreign markets which all are so gallantly making. Let us restore to the beneficent policy of protection its true meaning and just purposes. [Applause.]

[Mr. BARTLETT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] is recognized for forty minutes.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the only objection I have to the pending measure is that the proposed reduction on Cuban sugar is entirely inadequate, but, if it is all that can be obtained, it is still in keeping with the Democratic policy of tariff revision, no matter from what source this particular bill may come, or who may approve or oppose it.

As a special measure of relief to Cuba it should be passed, though it is at most but a partial fulfillment of the great moral obligation which we have assumed toward the people of that island. When amendments shall be proposed granting still further concessions they shall receive my support, and I should be willing to go to the limit of reduction, not only on Cuban sugar, but the raw and refined sugar of the world, and thereby lower the price of this necessary of life to the great body of American consumers who ask no protective legislation, but only the right to buy at the same competitive prices at which they are compelled to sell the products of their toil.

If I believed in protection for its own sake, and regarded a tariff schedule as a sacred thing not to be profaned by the unholy hand of revision, as many of our Republican friends profess to believe, I would stand with the beet-sugar industries of the Northwest and oppose this measure. But denying, as I do, the theory and practice of protection, believing its present manifestation to be a menace to healthy trade, and that it has fostered the most unjust and iniquitous system of industrial trusts ever devised by the cupidity of man, I shall stand with the great majority of my fellow-Democrats who believe that they see in the divisions of the other side of the Chamber the first apparent sign that the heavy load of unfair taxation will be lifted from the straining back of the patient consumer. The spectacle of the stall-fed sugar trust and the infant beet industry, whose lungs and capacity to kick at least are well developed, both offshoots of protection, calling each other hard names and filling the atmosphere with direful threats of retaliation, if not dignified, is at least a matter of congratulation to those who would escape from the hard conditions imposed by the protective-tariff system; for out of this confusion and division the man on the farm and the great mass of unprotected Americans may find a way to buy more cheaply, and lessen the present high cost of comfortable living.

As a Democrat, I believe that neither cane sugar nor beet sugar should have any more protection than cotton, or corn, or any other product of the farm and that every particle of protection should be taken off the necessaries of life.

I hope the American people will see in the scenes enacted on this floor a justification as well as a good reason for returning to the true principles of taxation, not to be used as a means of enriching the few at the expense of the many or of fleecing from the people, under the old and stale pretense of encouraging infant industries, but as the most important function of government to be wisely, honestly, and fairly administered for the benefit of all and for the exclusive use of none.

The whole system of protection was wrong from the beginning. As a policy of Government it has rarely if ever found favor with any student of economics, but has been almost universally condemned, and has only been tolerated by the patience of the people and sustained by the greed of its favorites. It has always operated to increase the cost of living to the masses and to put that increase into the pockets of the classes. If ever tolerable, it was in the earlier days when the rates of duty were not half so high as at present and when it seemed necessary to stimulate manufacturing industries in a country almost wholly agricultural.

These industries would have grown without protection, and probably in a healthier and more uniform way, and the wealth of the country have been more evenly distributed; but the farmer who has sold in the open market of the world has been forced to buy in protected markets, and the result has been that no matter how rich or productive his land or how arduous or intelligent his labor, he can make no more than a competency at best, and must forego the luxuries and too often the conveniences and necessities of modern life. So we have from decade to decade and year to year seen the wealth of the country absorbed to an abnormal degree by the manufacturing classes.

The second step in the industrial evolution came when combinations and alliances were formed to prevent prices from falling to their natural level and to reap the full advantage of tariff duties imposed for their assumed protection.

The third and most intolerable condition of all came when allied wealth in the form of trusts demanded and received still greater protection, and then, holding the home consumer at their mercy, began to export and sell their manufactured products to foreigners at less cost than to Americans.

This odious condition of affairs has been made possible by the system of misnamed protection, which fleeces the home consumer who pays the tariff duties and gives to the alien a benefit denied to our own people. A system so constructed as to demand and receive the highest price at home and the lowest price abroad for its manufactured products is one which can neither be approved in fair business dealings nor in sound morals.

The first time that the attention of the public was called to the enormity of this evil was in 1890, when the tariff reform committee of the Reform Club published a pamphlet entitled "Protection's Home Market." In this pamphlet we find quoted the domestic and export prices of numerous agricultural implements and tools, of kitchen utensils and household goods, carpenters' tools, hardware, etc. The domestic prices usually exceeded the foreign prices from 10 to 25 per cent, but the difference reached 100 per cent in some cases. A few of the articles and prices are found in the following table:

Articles.	Domestic price.	Foreign price.
Cultivators	$11.00	$8.40
Plows	14.00	12.60
Axes, per dozen	8.25	7.20
Kettles	1.40	.85
Wire nails, per 100 pounds	2.25	1.35
Table knives, per gross	15.00	12.00
Horse nails, per pound	.17	.14
Barbed wire, per 100 pounds	3.00	2.00
Rivets, do	10.00	5.55
Typewriters	100.00	60.00
Sewing machines:
Fine	27.50	20.75
Medium	22.00	17.50
Cheap	18.00	12.00

In some cases our sewing machines have been sold as low as $5 in the South American market.

There are many quotations available from Republican sources, admitting, explaining, or attempting to justify the custom of charging lower prices for export. Thus the New York Press of October 22, 1889, said:

It is sometimes looked upon as wise to ship goods out of the country at cost, rather than break the regular price for which such articles sell in the country in which they are produced.

The American Machinist of September 26, 1889, said:

Just why American manufacturers will sell machinery and other goods from 10 to 30 per cent cheaper in Europe than they will sell them to be used at home is rather puzzling; but anyone curious in the matter can easily enough find out that many of them do that. It may be necessary to cut prices in order to secure trade from abroad, but it is likely to strike the American purchaser as being a little rough on him.

The Engineering and Mining Journal of March 15, 1890, complained of the system, as follows:

As soon as an industry has obtained a position where it can more than supply our home market and has to send its goods abroad, where they compete with those of foreign manufacturers, it is evident that they are either giving the foreigners the benefit of lower rates than they do our own people or that they are able to get along at home without any protection from foreign manufacturers. It is not fair that our own people should be made to pay more than foreigners for the products of our own land.

A letter from Mr. A. B. Farquhar, the head of the great Pennsylvania Agricultural Works, to the Farmer's Call, of Quincy, Ill., may be quoted here. In answer to the Call's questions, Mr. Farquhar said:

JULY 30, 1890.

The fact is that our protective laws are a monstrous swindle upon the agricultural community. As a manufacturer I was inclined to say nothing on the subject, for the reason that it was natural to suppose if anybody was benefited it was the manufacturing class, to which I belong. But, as I have explained, the farmer is being destroyed. We are killing the goose for the golden egg. And I honestly believe now that it is to the interest of the manufacturers themselves to eliminate the protective feature from our tariff laws.

Certainly, as our manufactures are sold much lower abroad, we could only need protection to get better prices from our customers at home. We do manufacture and sell in Canada, South America, and Europe many agricultural implements and machines, and could we have free raw material and the commercial advantages which free trade would give us, America would become the great manufacturing emporium of the world, and the farmer, of course, would share the prosperity, since he would have less to pay for everything and get better prices for all he sold. Go on with your good work. When the farmer begins to think and rise up against this swindle it is doomed.

In answer to a claim made by the Australasian and South American (an export journal), that the lower prices quoted foreigners were for the wholesale trade only, the New York World published the following letter from the Engineering and Mining Journal of New York:

ENGINEERING AND MINING JOURNAL,
New York, August 26, 1890.

DEAR SIR: I am obliged to you for the letter of August 25, respecting proceedings taken in the Senate regarding our "prices current."

Prices quoted by us are, as you will notice, at the head of the first column, "for export only," and the prices therein given are the prices at which every foreign subscriber can buy in this market. It stands to reason that orders for farm implements are frequently given for one only. If to buy one machine is retail trade, then these foreign prices are retail prices.

Our domestic subscribers are debarred from the prices quoted in these columns. These special discounts are "for export only," and in more than one instance we have lost our advertiser through publishing these prices.

I inclose an invoice from S. Allen & Co., which you will see is for one of the machines quoted by us, and you will notice that it conforms exactly with our prices as reprinted by you in the World, and that the net price on the bill is exactly as stated by you in the World.

Your statement that the foreigner can buy at retail in this market cheaper than the domestic consumer is as indisputable as the daily revolution of the earth. We can enumerate any number of instances where houses have written us: "Prices furnished are for export only, and it would be most injurious to us if these figures were circulated in the home market."

In going through our letters this morning we counted no less than fifty-eight received during the month of July, thanking us for publishing the "prices current," as it enabled our subscribers to keep a check on the prices charged them on their indents.

Yours, very truly,

ENGINEERING AND MINING JOURNAL.

After examining the facts, Mr. J. Alex. Lindquist, the author of the tariff-reform pamphlet, concludes—that our manufacturers take advantage of our tariff to keep the price of their goods in our home market not merely much higher than they could do if there were no tariff, but much higher than they themselves would be able and willing to produce and sell the same goods for if they were not protected at all.

And asks the following pertinent question:

Why should our manufacturers be aided by our laws to charge our citizens more for the same goods than they do foreigners?

We find in a Government publication called the "Bureau of Statistics," under undoubted Republican auspices, a large number of valuable statements and confessions. We are informed, for instance, that "the progress of work on shipbuilding in the United States has been retarded because makers of steel materials require a higher price from the American consumers than from the foreign consumers for substantially similar products." Also, in addition to this, that "American export plate makers are interested in preventing the establishment of plate manufacturing in their customer nations abroad, and to that end bid low enough in foreign markets to discourage foreign nations from entering the field for producing their own plate at home." The same authority contends that this policy is "short-sighted," and shows how it has resulted in curtailing the home demand. Up to April, 1900, it "had resulted in a very positive shrinkage in domestic consumption. Farmers had ceased to purchase barbed wire for wire fences. Retail hardware dealers had complained for months of diminished business in nails and wires. Jobbers had gotten in the way of doing a hand to mouth business on prices that had advanced from $1.35 to $3.20 in the course of a year." The writer goes on to say:

If steel rails, for example, sell at Pittsburg for $35 per ton for months in succession for home consumption, while the foreign consumer is purchasing them for $22 to $24 per ton, the domestic market is sure to order no more than it is obliged to have for the time being. In the long run such a policy is short-sighted, because it puts an embargo on the expansion of investments in enterprises requiring iron and steel. It arrests constructive projects at home, while it stimulates construction abroad.

Those of our manufacturing interests that are outside of the trusts desire most earnestly that this condition of affairs should not continue. A good illustration of the way in which they regard the matter is afforded by a recent letter to the editor of the Iron Age, of New York, from Mr. F. A. Wilmot, president of the Wilmot & Hobbs Manufacturing Company, of Bridgeport, Conn., a portion of which reads as follows:

We would suggest that you give due prominence to the position which the manufacturing associations in the various cities, particularly along the Atlantic seaboard and Canadian border, and especially in New England, are taking as regards their present handicap in the cost of raw material, such as coal, coke, iron ore, pig iron, steel ingots, and billets, and their desire to have these commodities placed by Congress immediately on the free list. They believe that as these materials are produced cheaper in this country than in any other portion of the world and are sold abroad at lower prices than along the seaboard and Canadian border, the industries which produce them are no longer infant and do not need protection. They believe that protection, so called, is but another term for Government assistance to monopolies and trusts. This position the Government, as it now exists, can ill afford to assume, nor can it allow the people to feel that it is drifting into such a position where it is so working hand in hand with gigantic trusts, for when the people realize such to be the condition they will undoubtedly rise in their might and by their votes change the conditions and the Government which permits such conditions. * * * It is to be hoped that the Government of the United States will appreciate the position and make such changes in tariff regulations or duties from time to time as will result in putting upon the free list such commodities as do not further need protection on the score of their being infant industries.

This letter and other similar testimony does not indicate that the smaller manufacturers would be injured by a reduction of tariff duties.

In May, 1901, less than a year ago, Mr. Charles M. Schwab, the president of the steel trust, testifying before the Industrial Commission, startled the country by declaring that all kinds of American goods were usually sold much lower for export than in the home market. In fact, he said that the prices of everything for export were less than for domestic use and consumption, and that supplies and materials to be used in products for export were usually furnished to manufacturers at special prices, while goods to be exported were carried by the railroads at reduced rates. Here are some extracts from Mr. Schwab's testimony:

It is quite true that export prices are made at a very much lower rate than those here. * * * I think you can safely say this, that where large export business is done—for example, in the line of iron and steel—nearly all the people from whom supplies are bought for that purpose give you a good price for the materials that go into export; railroads will, in most instances, carry them a little cheaper for you, and so on all down the line. But labor, within my knowledge at least, has never been asked to work for a lower price for export material, so that labor benefits more by it than almost any other interest. * * *

Q. Is it a fact generally true of all exporters in this country that they do sell at lower prices in foreign markets than they do in the home market?
A. That is true; perfectly true. * * *

Mr. Byron W. Holt, of the tariff-reform committee of the New York Reform Club, also testified at length on the subject of tariffs and trusts before the Industrial Commission. The following are extracts from Mr. Holt's testimony in regard to export prices:

The concealment of export prices is probably responsible for considerable of the difference between the values of our exports and of our imports, and, therefore, for numerous editorials on our "favorable balance of trade."

Ten years ago it was comparatively easy to get the export prices of various protected articles, even though they were then often from 10 to 30 per cent below the home market prices. To-day, when great trusts control the prices on most of our exports, it is extremely difficult to obtain export prices. The editors of trade papers will no longer talk on this subject, and, as a rule, will not keep on file foreign exchanges which quote prices of certain American goods in foreign countries. It is only now and then that an employee of a trust or of some export house can be found who is willing to risk betrayal and almost certain decapitation if he talks on this subject.

Nearly all of the information on this point which I have obtained during the last few years has been strictly confidential. In this way I learned a few days ago that tin plate is being extensively offered and in some instances has been sold to manufacturers of cans and packages, to be filled with products for export, at about $1 per box below the price to other manufacturers and consumers. I am not permitted to mention any names. I also learned last week from an entirely reliable source that steel rails were sold some three months ago to foreigners at less than $21 per ton. I could specify the exact price, names of both seller and buyer, in an important recent transaction, but am not permitted to do so. These rails were sold with the provision that they were not to be used in the United States. That steel rails are sold for export at whatever the manufacturer can get above $20, and perhaps for considerably less if the time of delivery is remote enough, I do not doubt. The manufacturers' pool or selling agreement, under which rails are now sold for $28, is not effective on rails sold to foreigners or for export. The newspapers of a month or so ago contained the details of a sale of steel rails to an English firm for $15 per ton (allowing for freight) less than the price to Americans. The New York World of April 9, 1901, thus states the case:

"Mr. Charles Thulin, a Pennsylvania contractor, recently secured a contract to supply rails for Russia's great Siberian railway. He asked the leading steel trust companies here for bids. They all asked him about $35 per ton, with freight to be added. Mr. Thulin went over to England, sublet his contract to an English firm, and one of the same companies that had asked him $35, plus freight here, sold the rails at $24 a ton delivered in England to the English subcontractor." * * *

After having investigated this subject for more than ten years, I have reached the conclusion that practically all of our manufactured products are sold to foreigners for less than to Americans. The minimum difference is about 10 per cent. The average difference in price is probably 20 per cent, and on our really protected products above 25 per cent. Often we who pay the tariff taxes devoted to nourishing these "infant industries" must pay 50 per cent and sometimes 100 per cent more for the products of the coddled industries than is paid by foreigners who do not pay our nursing taxes.

The record in regard to the prices, foreign and domestic, of wire and wire rope is instructive and illustrative of the rapacity of the trust and the fraud practiced on the American consumer. The trust controlling these articles have put prices at home up to the tariff limit, while lowering prices to foreigners, so that our wire rope is exported to every foreign country, with the possible exception of England. As the duty on imported wire rope averages about 100 per cent, the trust charges domestic consumers about twice as much as it charges foreigners for its goods—often more than twice as much. For example, the domestic price of wire rope is about $5, $6, and $7.50 per 100 pounds, according to the different sizes, but the export prices for these sizes, respectively, are $2.34, $3.23, and $3.88. The prices of wire vary also according to the size. For the largest size the domestic price is about $4.25 per 100 pounds, and the export price about $2.62, or about 65 per cent in favor of the foreigner.

Our oil machinery manufactured in this country follows the same rule as our agricultural machinery. The farmers of Mexico, South America, and Canada can obtain our agricultural implements for half the money that our own farmers have to pay for them, and our oil machinery is sold at a lower figure to the Russians than to our own oil producers in Texas.

This favoritism to foreigners has been extended more or less to those nondescript peoples, half foreign and half domestic, who inhabit our colonial possessions, such as Hawaii and Porto Rico. Some of our manufacturers treat these peoples as foreigners and sell them our goods at reduced rates, and some treat them as people of our own country, and charge them accordingly.

An instance is cited where goods had been sold in Honolulu at such low prices that great quantities of them were brought back to California and sold there at profit in competition with similar goods in the domestic market which have never been out of the country. One of the aggrieved manufacturers registered his complaint in a letter to the Iron Age a few months ago, in which he said:

It so happens that at present the price of our goods is about 25 per cent higher for domestic consumption than the export prices. We had an inquiry for export prices, which we quoted. The order now comes in to be shipped to Honolulu. Is it fair to consider the Hawaiian Islands entitled to export prices? Our own opinion is that they have become a part of the United States and should be considered domestic territory as much as Alaska.

Many other instances might be cited and much more proof adduced to show the selfish and nefarious practices of the trusts, sustained, as they are, and fostered by the Republican party. Who doubts their absolute power in this Congress to prevent a change in a single tariff schedule, no matter how unjust or unnecessary it may be?

When the Republican party and a Republican President announce their opposition to the trusts, as a proof of sincerity we ask for a recommendation from the Executive that all or some of the articles selling abroad cheaper than at home be forthwith put upon the free list and that a bill be reported from the Ways and Means Committee to this effect. And when this Congress shall have adjourned, and not one of these articles shall have been put upon the free list, and not one tariff schedule reduced, then the American people will understand and rightly value these specious pretensions.

Mr. Chairman, the question of taxation is vital and comes directly home to all the people. It affects us all, but most of all the American farmer. I represent, in part, an agricultural constituency, as well as a city of large and growing commercial importance, but whose prosperity, in a great measure, depends upon the crops produced in the magnificent country which surrounds it. Her merchants and her laboring men are realizing more than ever the crushing power of the modern industrial trust.

The farmer who in the early spring goes out, turns up the soil, and plants the seed which he hopes will grow and burst into rich fruitage in the fall must depend upon seasons of sunshine and rain beyond his mortal control. A flood may come and his toil go unrequited. The drought, with its hot and fevered breath, may wither and blast the crops, and his despairing gaze may look upon parched fields of corn or the stunted growth of cotton as the unkind seasons come and go, bearing no measure of hope. If nature should smile upon his labors and the harvest should yield a rich abundance, it must then come in open competition with all other harvests wheresoever sown or reaped, and the price be fixed for his own, without his consent, in the free, open markets of the world; and then when he buys, it is in the trust-controlled market, with one-half of the proceeds of his labor exacted as a tribute.

Who says that such a farmer—and his type is to be found all over the continent—has a fair and equal chance in the great struggle? Who will deny that a partial and unjust system of taxation, which imposes these hard conditions upon his toil, weighs like a millstone upon all his endeavor, whether the seasons be good or bad?

The wife of the American farmer is compelled to use a sewing machine in her home, produced by an American factory, which costs nearly twice as much as the same machine sold the housewife of Mexico or South America. The blue rim of the mountain from which the sleeping ore is extracted may shadow the very lintels of his door; the smoke of the foundry where the crude material is fashioned into shape may float over and rest upon the furrows in his fields, yet he must pay more for the plow which came from the mountain and the factory than the Russian peasant on the banks of the Danube or the German burgher on the banks of the Rhine.

When I have gone into the homes of these farmers, brave and patient men as they are, with the best strain of patriot blood coursing through their veins, and asking nothing but a fair and equal chance in life, and behold the hard and unequal struggle, I sometimes shudder for the ending that must sooner or later come unless conditions are quickly and radically changed. And whenever they are sometimes drawn to heed political vagaries, promising immediate relief, who is to blame, they who suffer or those who make them suffer? When a trust magnate can harness his horses in golden livery and stable them in a mansion, while his wife puts diamond earrings in the ears of her pet cats, while the farmer must stint and save to buy his wife a new bonnet or his daughter a new dress, I feel that the doctrine of equal laws, equal rights and opportunities, has become an illusion, a mere matter of declamation in this Republic.

No one but a demagogue desires to make war on wealth, and none but fools will deny the difference in the capacity of men. When wealth is accumulated as the result of intelligent human endeavor, traveling the ways of equal opportunity, it stands as a distinction to its holder if it is the measure and quality of his ambition; but when it comes as a result of favoritism and the infamous system which now prevails whereby the many are robbed to enrich the few, and grows upon the ruins of honest competition, then it is an unmitigated curse, a badge of infamy, and the surest forerunner of national disaster and decay.

The danger to our Republic is from within, not without, and wealth should remember that the flood tide of prosperity will some day reach its ebb.

We all take pride in our expanding trade and the peaceful commercial invasion of the world, but it is all too dear if injustice to our people at home is the price we pay.

The manufactured products of this country have gone in sight of the Pyramids; they are sent within the gates of the Holy City and exposed for sale along the ways which the Saviour of mankind trod in the mission of redemption; they are found in the shadow of the Chinese Wall, and we rejoice at the high enterprise and the commercial genius of the American people. But we are not without competitors and foemen worthy of battle for the markets of the world, and other nations are challenging our progress. Under the industrial system now inaugurated, we have put weapons in their hands to wrest from our grasp the fairest and richest domains of trade which our enterprise has won, while at home we are crippling our great agricultural interests, the surest defense of a nation, affording its great storehouse of supplies in national distress and peril.

The time has come in this great industrial strife when the protective tariff is a burden and not an aid. Our mastery of the world is assured when we enter the contest on equal terms and demand no undue advantage either at home or abroad. As we open our ports to competition, so the ports of other countries will open to our advance, and new and various fields will present themselves. The rare skill of the American workman, the inventive genius of the American people, and the immense impetus of a freeborn race will win in a contest of fair exchange. The world to the uttermost part is the theater of our mighty activities. "Equal and exact justice to all; special privileges to none," is the sign by which we shall conquer. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to attempt in fifteen minutes to make a speech upon this subject. After three months of investigation, agitation, and political strife we have presented for consideration a measure entitled "A bill to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba." That title might imply that the purpose of the bill was to establish reciprocity. I find, however, that it does not embrace the first principle of reciprocity.

This bill proposes a horizontal reduction of 20 per cent of our tariff on Cuban products in consideration of the adoption of the immigration, exclusion, and contract-labor laws of the United States. This is not the promulgation of the principles of reciprocity, but rather the imposition upon a republic not yet formed of laws enacted for the protection of American labor and the preservation of the character of American citizenship.

We entered into the contest with Spain upon the broad principle of humanity, and expressly declared in the declaration of war that the intervention of the United States was for the express purpose of giving to the people of Cuba their liberty and independence. We sacrificed untold wealth and thousands of precious lives in order to release the downtrodden Cubans from Spanish tyranny and extend to them the blessings of American liberty. In every act from that day to this we have reiterated our purpose to insure the establishment of a stable form of government, free and independent, and yet on the eve of the organization of its government you propose by this measure to impose upon them laws adopted by our country for the protection of American labor and the preservation of the character of American citizenship. What right have we to thus anticipate the desires, wishes, and purposes of the people of Cuba?

We are told that it is our duty to do something for Cuba, as though we had not already extended to that island and her people the greatest blessings and advantages that was ever extended by any nation to a foreign people in the history of the world.

It is admitted that under the administration of our Government during the past three years the industries of Cuba have been most prosperous; that the production of sugar has multiplied threefold; that her people are well employed at good wages; that want and distress has been removed, and in place thereof activity, industry, and prosperity established. What more can be justly asked at the hands of our people? Who demands this further concession? Not the people of Cuba, for we no longer hear the cry of distress from them. We find in the hearings before the committee no evidence of distress, want, or suffering among the people of Cuba. It is, therefore, fair to inquire who is specially interested in the adoption of this measure. Certainly not the people of Cuba or her representatives. Only last Friday I read in the Washington Post a speech made by the president of Cuba, Hon. T. Estrada Palma, before the New York Chamber of Commerce, in which he stated that the reduction proposed by this measure "will in no way afford any relief to the present distress of the Cuban producers."

Here is a man, elected by the citizens of Cuba as their president, authorized to speak for his government and people, expressly declaring that this measure will in no way afford relief to the Cuban producers. He thus declares because he realizes that every dollar of the concession proposed will be absorbed by the sugar trust, whose emissaries have been engaged night and day circulating articles of misinformation over this country to the business men, through the newspapers, and in the halls of this Capitol for the purpose of securing a reduction of the duty upon raw sugar, so as to enable it to combat with the growing sugar-beet competitor that has been so marvelously developed in Michigan and other States under the principles of protection proclaimed and inaugurated by the Republican party.

It is admitted by everyone familiar with the subject that the proposed reduction of duty upon raw sugar from Cuba will in no way affect the price of refined sugar in this country, and consequently will be of no benefit whatever to the consumers of sugar in the United States. I represent a district composed of consumers of American products, and there is not a farmer or a sugar-beet industry within the district. If this measure would in any way benefit the consumers or reduce the price of refined sugar to them, there would be some incentive for me to make the sacrifice of Michigan's industrial interests, but the testimony before the committee conclusively establishes the fact that no reduction in the price of sugar will be made.

From the testimony I submit there is no positive evidence that the producers of sugar cane in the island of Cuba will derive any benefit whatever, but, on the contrary, our experience in Porto Rico and Hawaii justifies the assumption that the reduction will be entirely absorbed by the sugar trust.

I oppose this measure—

1. Because it seeks to impose conditions and secure concessions from a foreign people before they have had an opportunity to establish a stable form of government.

2. Because it is universally admitted that there is no distress, want of labor at good wages, or lack of industry in the island of Cuba justifying at this time any relief from the Treasury of our country or the sacrifice of our own industries.

3. Because it is an abandonment of the principles of protection and a direct injury to the infant sugar-beet industry of prodigious growth, which will, if permitted to thrive under existing laws, destroy the monopoly heretofore enjoyed by the sugar trust.

4. Because this law, if put into operation, would paralyze the further development of the sugar-beet industry in our country, and place in the hands of the sugar trust power to destroy, by purchase and competition, the advantages already secured.

During my service in Congress I have been able to follow with a great deal of pleasure the leadership, upon this side of the House, of the distinguished gentleman from New York. I have uniformly found him upon the right side of public measures and invariably opposed by the minority upon this floor. To-day I find the leader on this side joined hand in hand with the leader on the other side of the House, not only upon this floor, but in the committee, in favor of a measure embracing provisions inimical to the principles of the Republican party. When I see our leaders thus yoked together I hesitate to follow.

When I was a boy in Vermont I heard my father say that in the early days, when fireplaces were the only means of obtaining heat, they used to go into the woods and cut a log and haul it up to the house for fuel. An old farmer one day bought a new harness. The harness maker told him it was superior because made of horsehide. The next day, after breakfast, he put it on his horse and went into the woods to cut a log. While cutting the log it rained and the harness got wet. When he had prepared the log he took the horse by the bit, led him up to the house, and when he arrived there, upon looking back, somewhat to his surprise, he could see only the traces running down over the hill. He wondered where the log was. The effect of the rain had stretched the traces. It being noon, he tied his horse to the post and went in to dinner. While he was eating dinner the sun came out, and the effect upon the harness was such as to contract the traces, and as he came out from dinner he saw the old horse standing there, pulling for dear life, and coming up over the hill was the log, pulled along by the contraction of the traces. [Laughter.]

I think, Mr. Chairman, when the light of the noonday sun, in a tropical climate of midsummer, shall be turned upon this measure, the invisible traces will become known, and I fear we may find our honorable leaders yoked up to the chariot of the sugar trust. [Applause.]

I submit resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce and Convention League of Detroit and the board of directors of the Detroit River Sugar Company, protesting against this bill:

SIR: At a meeting of the Detroit Chamber of Commerce and Convention League, held this 27th day of February, 1902, the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas the interests of the people of the city of Detroit and the State of Michigan are affected adversely by the agitation in Congress, looking toward the reduction of the present reasonable and effective tariff on raw sugar; and

"Whereas this industry in Michigan, though in its infancy, gives promise of becoming under favorable conditions one of the most important in the State: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce and Convention League, of the city of Detroit, request our Representatives in Congress to work for the best interests of the beet-sugar industry by aiding to maintain the present tariff on sugar."

THOS. NEAL, President.
J. F. WALSH, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN B. CORLISS,
Washington, D. C.

At a meeting of the board of directors of the Detroit River Sugar Company, held at its office in Detroit this 27th day of February, 1902, the following resolution was adopted, moved by Mr. John A. Russell, supported by Mr. O. R. Baldwin:

"Whereas the discussions relative to the reduction of the tariff on raw sugar imported into the United States, which reduction, in the judgment of this board of directors, threatens grievous injury to existing beet-sugar manufacturing enterprises and discouragement to capital proposing to engage in similar enterprises, has been protracted to such an extent that further delay in reaching a decision thereupon favorable to the American sugar-producing industry will make it extremely hazardous for new capital to engage in the business with a view to production during 1902; and

"Whereas the prompt decision of Congress not to reduce the tariff on raw sugar entering the United States from foreign countries would have the effect of removing the single element of doubt that now intervenes against the investment of capital in the production of sugar from beets raised in the United States: Be it

"Resolved, That the president of this company be authorized and directed to communicate with our Representatives in the Congress of the United States, asking them to use their efforts in the direction of obtaining an early expression as to the intentions of the Congress in this regard, to the end and purpose that this company's directors may be in position to correctly advise their stockholders whether or not to expend their capital in the enterprise for which it has been subscribed; and be it further

"Resolved, That the directors and stockholders of this company do hereby protest against any change in the tariff conditions affecting the importation of raw sugar into the United States, whether from Cuba or elsewhere, as being dangerous to the interests of American capital invested in manufacturing and agriculture and of American labor depending upon them for profitable occupation."

DAVID I. SIMONS, President.
O. R. BALDWIN, Vice-President.
H. E. EMMONS.
G. N. SKINNER.
JOHN A. RUSSELL.

The advocates of this measure insist that it will establish reciprocal trade relations or reciprocity with Cuba. If so, then an amendment to extend similar relations with other countries is germane. I therefore submit an amendment which I shall, at the proper time, seek to have placed upon the bill.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of line 4, page 3, the following:

"That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to enter into negotiations with Canada for reciprocal trade relations, with a view to the establishment of a commercial agreement in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions may be secured in favor of the following products and manufactures of the United States, to wit:

"Furniture, stoves, drugs, boots, shoes, steel, brass, copper, and iron manufactured products, in consideration of the admission into the United States of wood pulp, hides, and sugar beets free of duty, and lumber, barley, and iron ore at 80 per cent of the rate of duty now levied upon such articles imported from foreign countries.

"Whenever, in the judgment of the President, such reciprocal and equivalent relations have been established by agreement, he shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to suspend by proclamation to that effect the imposition and collection of the duties now required upon the articles above mentioned, and thereafter the duties levied, collected, and paid upon such articles shall be in accordance with the terms of said agreement."

Mr. Chairman, this amendment embraces the principles of reciprocity, as declared by the Republican party, with a country most bountifully supplied with undeveloped natural resources of great benefit to our manufacturing interests, with a people similar in character to our own. I hold in my hand a petition to the House of Representatives, prepared by the Merchants and Manufacturers' Exchange of Detroit, signed by over 500 business men, respectfully praying for the establishment of reciprocal trade relations with Canada, and which I submit in support of the amendment.

We have in this country a trust controlling wood pulp. I desire by this reciprocal trade relation to secure wood pulp free of duty. It will save thousands of dollars annually to the reading public of our country. I ask in this amendment for free hides. We have shoe manufactories in this country with sufficient capacity to manufacture shoes for the world. Why should they pay duty on hides? We ask in this proposition for the free admission of sugar beets. Will you not give us that? I desire a reduction of the tariff on steel, iron, and other products mentioned, because the manufacturing interests of this country demand it.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] said the other day that the time was near at hand when we must meet this issue. Let us meet it now. I believe in cutting down the tariff on any product when an organization in this country is able to monopolize the trade and control the price of such article. [Applause.]

To the honorable members of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned merchants and manufacturers of Detroit, Mich., represent that a reciprocal trade agreement with the Dominion of Canada, prepared on the basis of equivalent concessions, would be of great benefit to the business interests of the United States, and they respectfully solicit your active influence to the end that such a treaty may be negotiated and ratified.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, the people of my district are especially interested in the measure now pending before Congress. Generally the people of Louisiana, though in a less degree, are vitally interested in the issues involved by the passage of this measure; but in discussing this measure I shall not limit myself purely to the local bearing this bill may have on my constituents, nor shall I limit my argument with the effect it might have upon the people of Louisiana, which in part I represent, but I hope to take a broader ground and to discuss this question from a broad rather than a local standpoint.

I may preface my remarks with the statement that from the first tariff act—that of July 4, 1789—enacted by the Congress of the United States until the tariff act of 1890 no tariff legislation has been passed by the American Congress that did not impose a substantial tariff upon sugars imported into this country. I make an exception of the tariff act of 1890, because that tariff act put sugar on the free list. Yet at the same time, in order to give that industry an equality of standing in the market with other industries benefited by tariff legislation, a bounty of 2 cents on refined sugars and of 1⅛ cents on inferior grades was paid the domestic sugar growers of this country. The bounty schedule of that tariff was opposed at that time by the Louisiana sugar producers.

The reason for the opposition was that it was thought that a bounty would not meet with the general approval of the people of the United States. Against the protest of the sugar producers of Louisiana this bounty was given, and then there was a provision placed in the bill which provided that the President of the United States, by proclamation, might declare a tariff upon sugars coming from countries where, in his opinion, a discrimination was made by the tariff legislation of such country against the introduction of American manufactured goods into it, and the President of the United States was authorized, by proclamation, to legislate and to impose a tariff upon goods coming from such country, and then to cancel this proclamation tariff by enacting reciprocity treaties with the countries discriminating against American manufactured goods. That tariff became law in 1890.

It is my purpose to demonstrate that neither Republican nor Democrat should vote for this measure, nor should any American give it his support. The Republican members should not vote for it because it contemplates a violation of good faith, by that party, with the domestic sugar producer.

In 1890, when the tariff on sugar was abandoned for the first time, as I have related, paragraph 231 of that bill, commonly known as the McKinley bill, gave a bounty on sugars as follows:

Sugars not below 90° polariscope, 2 cents per pound.

Sugars between 80° and 90° polariscope, 1⅛ cents per pound.

Paragraph 726 placed sugars not above 16 Dutch standard, which is commonly known as raw sugar, on the free list.

By paragraph 237 sugars above 16 Dutch standard, which is known as refined sugar, five-tenths of a cent per pound duty was imposed.

And where the sugar was imported into this country from a country which placed a bounty on such sugars, then a countervailing duty of one-tenth of a cent per pound was placed in addition to the five-tenths cent just mentioned.

Then came section 3, authorizing the President by proclamation to place a duty on sugar and one or two other articles mentioned in the section when coming from a country where it was desired to have a treaty of reciprocity enacted between such country and the United States, and upon the adoption of such a treaty by the two countries to remove that duty. The section fixed the extent to which the President could by proclamation enact tariff legislation against such country as he desired to enter into reciprocal trade.

Sugars not above 13 Dutch standard and not above 75° polariscope paid a duty of seven-tenths of a cent per pound, and for each additional degree of the polariscope was added two one-hundredths of a cent per pound.

Sugars above 13 Dutch standard and not above 16 Dutch standard, 1⅛ cents per pound.

Sugars above 16 Dutch standard and not above 20 Dutch standard, 1⅛ cents per pound.

In 1892 the Democratic party in convention at Chicago adopted in its platform the following plank, which has special relation to this section of the McKinley law. That plank, section 4, reads as follows:

Trade interchange on the basis of reciprocal advantages to the countries participating is a time-honored doctrine of the Democratic faith, but we denounce the sham reciprocity which juggles with the people's desire for enlarged foreign markets and freer exchanges by pretending to establish closer trade relations for a country whose articles of export are almost exclusively agricultural products with other countries that are also agricultural, while erecting a custom-house barrier of prohibitive tariff taxes against the richest of the countries of the world, that stand ready to take our entire surplus of products and to exchange therefor commodities which are necessaries and comforts of life among our own people.

In 1893 the Democrats came into power, and in 1894 what was known as the Wilson bill was enacted. In that bill sugar was restored to the dutiable list and the bounty was repealed. The sugar-schedule provision in that bill was as follows:

Paragraph 182½ imposed a tariff on all sugars imported into this country of 40 per cent ad valorem. Then there was a differential in favor of refined—that is, covering all sugars above 16 Dutch standard, on which sugars a duty of one-eighth cent per pound was added to the 40 per cent ad valorem; and again there was a countervailing duty—that is, where sugars came from a country paying any kind of a bounty to the domestic producer of that country, then one-tenth of a cent per pound additional was placed upon such sugars.

The reciprocity clause of the McKinley law, which was section 3 of the act of 1890, was by section 71 repealed in so many words.

This was looked upon by the Republicans as a breaking of faith by the Democratic party with the domestic sugar producer, and that feeling found expression in the national Republican platform of 1896. The plank relating to that section of the Wilson bill repealing section 3 of the act of 1890 reads as follows:

We believe the repeal of the reciprocity arrangements negotiated by the last Republican Administration was a national calamity, and we demand their renewal and extension on such terms as will equalize our trade with other nations, remove the restrictions which now obstruct the sale of American products in the ports of other countries, and secure enlarged markets for the products of our farms, forests, and factories.

Protection and reciprocity are twin measures of Republican policy and go hand in hand. Democratic rule has recklessly struck down both, and both must be reestablished. Free admission for the necessaries of life which we do not produce; reciprocity agreements of mutual interests which again open markets for us in return for our open markets to others. Protection builds up domestic industry and trade and secures our own markets for ourselves; reciprocity builds up our foreign trade and finds an outlet for our surplus.

We condemn the present Administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country. The Republican party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use, and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

In 1897, the Republicans securing control of the Government, the Dingley law was enacted that same year. The Republican party again returned to the doctrine of reciprocity, though the method of applying that doctrine was changed from the method which had prevailed under the McKinley law. Paragraph 209 of the Dingley law placed a tariff on sugars not above 16 Dutch standard and not above 75° polariscope at ninety-five one-hundredths of a cent per pound, and provided an additional thirty-five one-thousandths of a cent per pound for every additional degree of the polariscope. That established, the scale of tariff upon sugar per 100 pounds was as follows:

	Cents.		Cents.
76°	.985	89°	1.44
78°	1.055	91°	1.51
80°	1.125	93°	1.58
82°	1.195	95°	1.65
84°	1.265	97°	1.72

Then there was, by the same section, a differential duty allowed (that is, refined sugars, or sugars above 16 Dutch standard, regardless of the polariscopic test, received a flat duty of $1.95 per 100 pounds); and then there was a countervailing duty, which in that law was fixed on the equivalent of whatever bounty was paid by the country from whence the sugar came; and then there was a reciprocity section, which enabled the President, by reciprocal trade arrangements with other countries, to reduce this tariff 20 per cent, provided the reciprocity should not continue for more than five years, and fixing the limit of time—two years—within which such treaty should be enacted by the President. Hence it is that the President can not to-day, under this provision, enact a treaty of reciprocity with Cuba without the proposed action on the part of Congress as defined in this bill.

When this bill was pending before the House prominent members on the Republican side, in their several speeches upon the bill, all declared that the purpose of this provision of the tariff bill was to renew the faith that had been broken, as they claimed, by the Democratic party with the American sugar producer by the passage of the Wilson bill, and to carry out the platform declaration of their party, as I have read it a while ago.

Mr. GROSVENOR said, in his speech of March 24, 1897:

There is not a principle involved in its formation, not a condition suggested in its ramification, not a rate of duty, not a principle of tariff taxation that has not been protested against by the sugar trust and fought to the bitter end before the Committee on Ways and Means.

We propose that instead of sending $125,000,000 a year to the foreign countries of the world, most of which goes to pay labor in the production of sugar, we will make it possible for every pound of sugar that we want to be produced in the United States of America.

The Republican party comes and offers to the agriculturists of this country this magnificent boon. We will protect the industries of the country in all directions from further demoralization, and we ask you to turn aside hundreds of thousands of acres of the splendid lands of all of these States from the production of corn, oats, wheat, potatoes, and cotton, to be put into an already overstocked market, to the production of sugar, and give to the farmers upon the farming lands of the country a better market with less competition than they now have.

On the next day Mr. STEELE said:

With regard to sugar, I predict that if the tariff fixed by this bill is unchanged for a period of ten years, we will at the end of that time be producing not only enough for our own consumption, but as much as we care to export, and at very little additional cost to the consumer.

On the same day Mr. PAYNE said:

Mr. Chairman, I will tell the House how we propose to reduce revenue when it becomes necessary to do so, but I can only hint at it now, as my remaining time is so limited. We propose to take off five or six millions a year of duty on the linen that we import by producing it in this country and not having to pay any duty upon it, because it will not be imported. [Applause on the Republican side.] We propose to raise beet sugar and cane sugar enough in this country to supply all our 73,000,000 people, who must have the best in the world, and in that way we will take off $50,000,000 in the course of a few years.

On July 19, 1897, both Mr. Dingley, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and Mr. PAYNE, then member and now chairman of said committee, used this very significant language. Mr. PAYNE said:

What shall be done with the sugar trust? Well, I will tell you what, in my opinion, is the best way of dealing with it. Establish a beet-sugar factory in every Congressional district in the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] Give competition and lots of it everywhere. Put the farmers over against the trust by passing this bill and reduce the price of sugar so that German raw sugar can not be brought in to be refined here.

Gentlemen on the other side, come over and help us, while we help the farmers out. [Laughter and applause.] You grangers over there, come and help us. You Populists, that go up and down the streets day after day proclaiming your devotion to the interests of the farmers, help us out now when we are trying to help the farmers in this industry that we can establish so successfully. In this way you will do something toward demolishing the trust. You will accomplish more in this way than by mere invective—by running windmills, and all that. [Laughter and applause.]

Why should we not produce all of our sugar in this country? Why, it costs us, Mr. Speaker, about one hundred millions. We were looking around for proper subjects for taxation. We knew that sugar would produce an enormous revenue; and besides all that, we knew that all adequate protective tariff would build up the industry in this country, and as it was gradually built up the revenue from that source will be reduced; by and by the revenue will come in more largely from other sources, and when this industry is fully established and revenue from sugar ceases the reduction will keep pace with the increase. The thing will regulate itself; we will not disturb our tariff in the next quarter of a century.

And Mr. Dingley said:

It should be borne in mind that the general increase of duty on sugar made in the proposed tariff has been made not only to increase the revenue, but also to further encourage the production of beet sugar in this country and furnish a new crop for our farmers, who are being sorely pressed as to our large wheat surplus by Russian and South American competition. I believe the time has come when the production of our own sugar from the beet ought to be and can be successfully entered upon, and thus the seventy-five millions sent abroad for the purchase of our sugar ultimately distributed here to our farmers. Already, indeed, it has been demonstrated that we can successfully produce beet sugar here, and the proposed duty placed on that article will gradually bring this about, while for the time being affording increased revenue.

Certainly nothing can be done to so successfully clip the wings of the sugar trust as to develop our beet-sugar industry. Sugar-beet factories turn out their product in a refined form, and thus become the efficient competitors of other refiners. The successful establishment of the sugar-beet industry in even half of the twenty-six States which can and will successfully grow sugar beets under the proposed tariff would speedily end any sugar trust, and would at the same time confer immense benefit on our farmers and all of our people.

It is quite clear in all of these declarations that the attempt of the Republican party to-day, under the management of the same leaders who managed the passage of the Dingley law in 1897, with the proposed cut of 20 per cent on Cuban sugar, the main competitor of the domestic sugar producers of this country is a violation of faith on the part of that party and its leaders with the domestic sugar producer. It is an unnecessary, unjust, and brutal violation of good faith. For, Mr. Chairman, if the Democratic party in its passage of the Wilson bill broke faith with the domestic sugar producer—and it was so declared by the Republican convention—then the Republican party to-day is breaking faith with the domestic sugar producer in attempting to foist upon this country in behalf of a people whom they claim are to-day suffering, and whom the proof shows are not suffering at all, by fixing a tax less than the Wilson rate upon sugars coming into competition with domestic sugar.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have had occasion, some two years ago, in addressing sugar planters in Louisiana, to take the position that while the Republican party favored protection to all American industries, it also favored reciprocity; that the reciprocity which it favored, as contemplated by the Dingley law, was such an application of that policy as provides for reciprocal trade agreement with sugar as a basis; that the Republican party in carrying out the doctrine of reciprocity was to enter into such agreement only with sugar-producing nations and with sugar as a basis of such trade agreement.

In his speech a few days ago the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], in his effort to carry out his party's behest to break faith with the American sugar producer, catechised his Republican colleagues who, representing districts in the North and West, where sugar is produced, have been valiantly resisting the efforts of the Republican leaders on this floor to carry out this violation of faith; and I desire to call the especial attention of these gentlemen, whose courage, convictions, and manly conduct deserves the plaudits not only of their own constituency, but of the entire people throughout the United States—I desire to call their attention, and the attention of the country generally, to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] made only a few days ago on this subject. He said:

I remember the discussion growing out of that bill. For ten days we sat here in the Committee of the Whole and the bill was discussed. A great question arose; and, strangely enough, it was, among other things, the sugar tariff which caused the great interest therein. It was the purpose of the Republicans in that body to place sugar on the free list, and we had a sort of battle cry—I always thought it was more or less unworthy—of a "free breakfast table," and we shook our fists in the faces of the Democrats on the other side and demanded a "free breakfast table." So it was, however, that we placed sugar on the free list absolutely, making no tariff upon the raw-sugar product of Cuba, but placing a bounty of 2 cents a pound upon the American product of sugar. At that time we were looking forward to the question of the production of beet sugar. We also provided for the free introduction into the United States of machinery for the manufacture of beet sugar. We had made arrangements for the free introduction into the United States of sugar-beet seed.

I cite this fact to show that the beet-sugar industry was then in ease, if not in an assured condition of success. The great question as to the sugar schedule of that day grew out of the difference of opinion between Mr. Blaine, who had been for a long time an advocate of reciprocity, and William McKinley, who was at that early day also a disciple of Blaine reciprocity, but not committed to all the details of Blaine's position. It so happened that I myself heard in the State Department an almost acrimonious discussion between Mr. McKinley and Mr. Blaine upon this question, one side favoring a tariff on sugar, hides, etc., all put into the schedule, and then left competent for the President of the United States, in case of reciprocity, to take the tax off sugar. This was a question of law and administration, and both the great leaders to whom I have referred favored the use of sugar as a basis of reciprocal negotiation. Sugar was then an "infant industry," and yet these two great champions of protection favored reciprocity in this article.

There never has been an attempt to establish reciprocal trade with any great sugar-raising country that did not involve negotiation looking for the use of sugar as one of the articles to be affected.

The other great leaders of the party at the time took exactly the other view of it, and argued in favor of leaving the duty off or prescribing the amount that should be proclaimed by the President in case reciprocity should fail. And so it was that we ultimately placed sugar on the free list, providing that there was no adequate of sufficient or satisfactory reciprocity granted by the foreign States; then the President of the United States might put sugar coming from such country onto the tariff schedule at a rate of duty which we prescribed in the law.

Then we went forward, and reciprocity for the first time found an enduring place upon the statute books of the United States. And reciprocity at that early period of time numbered within the articles that were to be taken possession of and dealt with for reciprocal trade with foreign countries this same vexed article of sugar. Then came the Democratic tariff of 1894, the so-called Wilson bill, which grew out of the defeat of our party in 1890 and 1892, and in that law the Democratic party placed itself in utter hostility to the reciprocity conditions or propositions of the McKinley law and put the tariff on sugar, and we went forward through the disastrous period with which we are all familiar and about which I do not propose now to talk.

Then came the Dingley bill. Now, let me tell gentlemen who undertake to assault members of this House for lack of fidelity to the Dingley law that it would be well for them before they attempt to sow the seeds of discord in the Republican ranks in this country, before they attempt to aid the Democratic party of this country to secure a majority in the next House, it would be well for some politicians and statesmen to know something about what they are talking about. [Laughter.]

Everybody who had anything to do with making the Dingley law—and there are present in this House no less than seven or eight of the members who all that winter long following the election of McKinley in November, sat down day and night and Sundays in the Cochran Hotel and worked on the bill which was to be offered in the spring, and they will all remember that Mr. Dingley and the weight of opinion in that conference was against the high rate of duty that afterwards appeared in the law on raw and refined sugar. But at last, after a long contest, lasting all winter, and after the sugar trust had been heard, and after the beet-sugar men had come here in full force—intelligent men, far-sighted gentlemen—the Dingley bill was passed in the House, providing for a certain reduction upon raw sugar from Cuba and every other country that would enter into reciprocal relations with the people of the United States.

Again, speaking of the conference between the House and Senate on the Dingley bill, he says:

If we should cut down the duty upon refined sugar it would harm the beet-sugar interest, and if we should cut down the duty on raw sugar, then we should benefit, it was said, the sugar trust, as it was called. So, at last, finding ourselves led by Dingley, so far as the House members of the conference were concerned, we voted to retain those provisions—to retain the high duty upon sugar—with the distinct expectation, which every member of Congress had at that time, that sugar would be one of the prime articles that would be used in the interest of reciprocity.

And he concludes:

Now, I have shown conclusively, and I challenge contradiction, that sugar has been, in Republican estimation and in Republican enactment and in Republican discussion, understood to be a fit subject of reciprocity.

Thus it is seen, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in this argument confirms the position that I occupied when addressing myself to the sugar producers of Louisiana, and it is well that our friends on the other side should fully appreciate the import of that position. This is said in no spirit of disparagement of the former conduct of the beet-sugar growers in the politics of the country, but it is well that a man engaged in a business predicated upon the good faith of party leaders should know exactly how such party leaders stand in reference to their pursuits, and should understand not merely what the declarations of the party may be, but what the practice of that party is, and it is to that that I shall direct the attention of the gentlemen at this time.

This argument possibly in no wise appeals to my colleagues on the Democratic side, but as I propose to show that under Democratic doctrine there is no room for reciprocity, they may be expected to stand aside while I demonstrate the correctness of my contention and the contention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that reciprocity as understood and as practiced by the Republican party is such a consummation as compels the domestic sugar producer to buy on a highly protected market everything that he uses and consumes, and to sell on a reciprocity market, which is only another word for a free-trade market, everything he produces.

I have shown by the utterances of one closely connected with tariff legislation what his conception of his party's utterances on reciprocity is. Now, I propose to show the acts of that party and to demonstrate that both he and I are correct—that is, the Republican party only favors such reciprocity as will tend to assist other protected manufactured goods in this country at the expense, under the doctrine of reciprocity, of the domestic sugar producer.

An investigation of the reciprocity treaties as enacted, both under the Dingley law and the McKinley law, confirms me in the opinion that this is so. I have here a list of all the treaties enacted.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Certainly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman from Louisiana would not have the House understand that at that time we were producing any considerable amount of sugar?

Mr. BROUSSARD. No; we were producing about 250,000 tons of sugar, mainly in Louisiana. It is not pertinent to the discussion of this question whether the President, under the McKinley law, was authorized to impose a tariff on sugar and then destroy that tariff to secure reciprocal trade, but it is pertinent to demonstrate that the policy of the Republican party has been properly announced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] when he says that sugar has been the main basis of reciprocity under Republican doctrine.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That was because it was an article of necessity and they could traffic in it. We did not produce that necessity.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The gentleman will allow me to say that we do not do it now. We may do it in the near future.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. We will do it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I think we can do it. I am not saying this in criticism of the gentleman; I agree with him in the position he occupies. What I am saying is in line with the general argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], which I have been maintaining for three years in my district.

Now, an examination of the treaties negotiated under the McKinley and Dingley laws will demonstrate the correctness of the position. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] who has argued that reciprocity was Democratic doctrine, and who quoted extensively from Thomas Jefferson, to this fact: That, strange to say, arguing reciprocity was Democratic and quoting Jefferson in support of his position, he did not produce a single treaty, negotiated by Jefferson himself or by Jefferson's Administration while he was President of the United States, carrying out the doctrine that he announced here. The first treaty of reciprocity, barring one enacted in 1856, was the treaty of 1876, and that treaty was with Hawaii, enacted by a Republican administration, placing upon the American market Hawaiian sugar in free competition with the only sugar of the United States, that produced in Louisiana.

The reciprocity treaties enacted under section 3 of the act of 1890 was with Brazil in 1891; with Spain, not with reference to Spain itself but with reference, and it is so mentioned in the treaty, to Cuba and Porto Rico, both exporters of sugar. The reciprocity treaty in 1891 with Santo Domingo, an island exporting sugar; with British Guiana; with Trinidad and Tobago and the Barbados; the Leeward Islands and the Windward Islands; with Jamaica; with Salvador in 1891, and Nicaragua and Guatemala and Honduras, all exporters of sugar, are all based on sugar as the primary article intended to be affected by the treaty. There was not one single treaty enacted under the McKinley law that was not predicated upon sugar as a basis of such treaty.

Now, it does not make much difference, in so far as this argument is concerned, that these things transpired then, because the producer was receiving his 2 cents bounty, or 1⅛ of a cent on sugar below certain tests, but it is significant, that both under the McKinley and the Dingley law, with few exceptions, all treaties that have been enacted, and most of the latter treaties remain unratified in the Senate to-day, are predicated upon a discrimination against the domestic sugar producer. Under the tariff act of 1897 there was a treaty with France; sugar is not a part of it, but I mention all of them that I may show that my position is not partisan and that I may argue from a broad standpoint. The treaty with France in 1896, with Germany in 1900, with Portugal and Italy are all ratified.

Now, as to the unratified treaties. Let us see how they read. There is a treaty with the United Kingdom, not for goods produced in England, but for goods produced in Jamaica, Coacas, and the Turks Island, and the Barbados, all producers of sugar; with Denmark, not with reference to goods produced in Denmark, but goods produced in the Danish West Indies, sugar-producing islands; with the Dominican Republic, a producer and exporter of sugar, Nicaragua and Ecuador and Argentina. They all show that the basis of the treaty was the reduction of the tariff on raw sugar, that the trust might obtain its sugar cheaper to compete with the American sugar producer. The reduction on sugar from Barbados and other islands is 12½ per cent. On Argentina it is 20 per cent, the full limit allowed by the Dingley law.

Now, these treaties show that while gentlemen on the other side argue, and I believe they argue conscientiously, that the doctrine of reciprocity, as understood by the Republican party, is a reciprocity that does not interfere with domestic producers, in fact and in practice the application of the doctrine has been peculiarly resting on sugar as a basis. Sugar has been the main prop of every reciprocity treaty enacted, both under the Dingley and under the McKinley laws. Gentlemen tell us that this bill provides for only 20 per cent reduction on sugar from Cuba; that it will not harm the American sugar producer.

Do you remember that they made the same argument in 1876? Look over the debates upon that question. Reciprocity with Hawaii was the theme then, and free sugar through Republican legislation was brought from there to this country under that treaty. Do you remember—I remember it because during every subsequent transaction of this character I have had the honor of a seat upon this floor—do you remember that when Hawaii was annexed to the United States gentlemen on the other side of the House and some on this side also said: "Well, Hawaii produces only a certain amount of sugar and can not interfere with the domestic sugar producer?"

Hawaii was annexed. What has been the result? She produced more the next year after annexation than all the domestic producers of sugar produced in this country. Do you remember that when the Porto Rico bill was pending here, and when it was proposed to reduce the tariff by cutting the Dingley rate to 25 per cent of the duty imposed by that act, gentlemen said: "It can not hurt us, because Porto Rico produces only 150,000 tons of sugar annually?" Yet what has been the result? To-day the sugar of Porto Rico comes into competition with that of our domestic producer; and Porto Rico has doubled her production since.

Do you remember that the other day when we had the Philippine bill before us, and it was proposed to cut the Dingley rate upon the products of the Philippine Islands coming into this country, gentlemen said: "They produce only a little sugar, and the importation can not hurt the domestic producer?" So the Philippines were packed on top of Hawaii and Porto Rico. And, now we come to the greatest cane-producing island of all the world; and gentlemen make the same argument that this island does not produce much sugar, and the importations from it can not affect the domestic sugar producer of this country. They have made this argument on all occasions and on every one of these propositions.

They have made it until they have piled up the production of Hawaii, and the production of Porto Rico, and the production of the Philippines; and now they propose to pile on the production of Cuba. And they say it can not hurt us because each of these, singly, does not produce very much sugar. Soon we may expect a repetition of the argument when this Republican Administration concludes the purchase of the Danish West Indies. The argument in each case is that the domestic producer can not be harmed. Singly, possibly not, but collectively the certain destruction of the domestic industry must follow such policy.

Mr. Chairman, putting the entire production of these islands together, they can produce much more sugar than can be consumed in this country; nay, they can produce all the sugar to supply the consumption of the world. I am borne out in this statement by statistics collected by our Government, and the proposition will scarcely be controverted by any gentleman familiar with the subject.

Of course this is no argument to meet the position that some gentlemen occupy on this floor, but it does meet the argument of gentlemen on the other side who are now advocating a 20 per cent reduction of tariff on the Cuban product. It does meet their assumption that while they are urging this kind of "reciprocity" they are in favor of protection to all American industries. The kind of "reciprocity" which they favor affects only the domestic sugar producer. In other words, they want everything that is sold in this country, everything that the American sugar producer must buy and use in his home and in the manufacture of his sugar, sold on a protected basis; and yet, when it comes to his product, they want him to sell in a free market.

It is a matter of easy determination, susceptible of absolute proof, that the rate of tariff on sugar as fixed in the Dingley law, with the annexation by the Republican party of Hawaii and Porto Rico, whose sugars come free, and of the Philippines, whose tariff on sugar has been immensely reduced, and with the present proposition going into effect, is less than 40 per cent ad valorem, the duty fixed in the Wilson bill.

I do not think any gentleman will controvert that proposition. So that we are again brought to the forced conclusion that if the Democratic party broke faith with the domestic sugar producer, as declared by the Republican platform of 1896, the Republican party has not only broken faith with them but has rendered their position more precarious than it was during the existence of the Wilson law. For while then the tariff on sugar bore a just proportion to other tariffs, while then the domestic sugar producer received a small tariff on his product, he in turn had the privilege of buying every product which entered into his life, his home, and his business in a market where such product received the benefit merely of an equivalent tariff.

The domestic sugar producer might be said to be in the position that the smallness of the tariff on his product was balanced when he went on the market to buy what he needed by the small tariff on the products that he needed, used, and consumed. Under present conditions the domestic sugar producer finds himself in a position where he is compelled to buy on the highest protected market in the world everything that enters his household, his business, and his needs, and to dispose of his own product upon a market where the equal protection intended for him under the law has been broken down and destroyed, step by step, until he is forced into competition with the cheap product of other countries.

This fact is so palpable and so significant that I trust gentlemen on the other side and the people of the country generally will note the unjust and systematic discrimination that has been conducted by the Republican party against the domestic sugar producer North, South, and West.

The Republican party has said that protection and reciprocity go hand in hand. The President has said that reciprocity is the "handmaid" of protection. That may be true in theory, but unquestionably in practice it is not so. I say that reciprocity as appiied to sugar is the "cat's-paw" of protection; for the domestic sugar producer sees a systematic movement on the part of the Republican party to use his industry to pull the nuts from the fire and to perpetuate the exorbitant tariff rates upon other manufactured goods in this country.

In other words, when the tariff rate is so high upon everything that a surplus grows in the Treasury to such an extent as requires the pruning out of this surplus the domestic sugar producer finds that in order to maintain the high rates on other industries and other manufactured goods the Republican party, with the cry of "reciprocity," forces him upon the altar of sacrifice. It is true that sugar is used to produce revenue when revenue is needed, but is also used to reduce revenue when more favored industries are involved.

And for one I never can see, in view of these facts, how any sugar producer can subscribe to the twin doctrines of the Republican party on this question. Rather would I trust to the doctrine of the Democratic party, which contemplates a tariff for revenue, for upon that basis the sugar producer can predicate the most truly just argument for a tariff; and a good tariff should be placed upon his product, for the reason that it is the article which produces most revenue, which gives the least protection, and which bears most universally and justly and equitably on all the people of the country, and therefore is the fairest of all the tariffs.

I have heretofore argued that no Republican should vote for this measure, and I have heretofore stated that no Democrat can vote for it. I believe I have proved that no Republican should vote for it, and I shall now undertake to prove that this measure is not entitled to a single Democratic vote on this floor.

I shall predicate my first argument on this point upon the fact that this measure is purely a Republican measure, and a vote on the Democratic side in its support is a vote to further the interest of the Republican Administration, which position, in my mind, no Democrat should take unless there are very grave reasons why he should assist in carrying out an adverse Administration measure as a matter of essential interest to the entire country. That this is a Republican measure is palpable. The following excerpts from various reports recite a part of the history of this bill and its Republican paternity. I shall give them.

President McKinley, in his message to us of December 5, 1899, said:

> This nation has assumed before the world a grave responsibility for the future good government of Cuba. We have accepted a trust, the fulfillment of which calls for the sternest integrity of purpose and the exercise of the highest wisdom. The new Cuba yet to arise from the ashes of the past must needs be bound to us by ties of singular intimacy and strength if its enduring welfare is to be assured. Whether those ties shall be organic or conventional, the destinies of Cuba are in some rightful form and manner irrevocably linked with our own, but how far and how is for the future to determine in the ripeness of events.

Major-General Wood, military governor of Cuba, in an authorized statement recently published, said:

> On the other hand, unless action is taken, and taken promptly, on the question of tariff reduction, Cuba will be a monument, not to the good effects of our intervention, but to the ruin which has followed the destruction of her great industry.

The Secretary of War, in his annual report for 1901, said:

> Our present duty to Cuba can be performed by the making of such reciprocal tariff arrangements with her as President McKinley urged in his last words to his country at Buffalo on the 5th of September. A reasonable reduction in our duties upon Cuban sugar and tobacco in exchange for fairly compensatory reductions of Cuban duties upon American products will answer the purpose, and I strongly urge that such an arrangement be promptly made.

And again:

> Aside from the moral obligations to which we committed ourselves when we drove Spain out of Cuba, and aside from the ordinary considerations of commercial advantage involved in a reciprocity treaty, there are the weightiest reasons of American public policy pointing in the same direction; for the peace of Cuba is necessary to the peace of the United States; the health of Cuba is necessary to the health of the United States; the independence of Cuba is necessary to the safety of the United States. The same considerations that led to the war with Spain now require that a commercial arrangement be made under which Cuba can live. The condition of the sugar and tobacco industries of Cuba is already such that the earliest possible action by Congress upon this subject is desirable.

President Roosevelt, in his annual message to us last December, said:

> Elsewhere I have discussed the question of reciprocity. In the case of Cuba, however, there are weighty reasons of morality and of natural interest why the policy should be held to have a peculiar application, and I most earnestly ask your attention to the wisdom, indeed to the vital need, of providing for a substantial reduction in the tariff duties on Cuban imports into the United States. Cuba has in her constitution affirmed what we desired—that she should stand in international matters in closer and more friendly relations with us than with any other power—and we are bound by every consideration of honor and expediency to pass commercial measures in the interest of her material well-being.

The idea involved in this bill saw its origin, you will recall, in General Brooke's report while governor-general of Cuba. It was upon General Brooke's recommendation that President McKinley predicated his recommendation of 1899. It was the recommendation of General Wood to the Republican Secretary of War, that the Republican Secretary of War recommended the matter to the Republican President. It was the Republican President that recommended this measure to the Republican Congress, and then you will recall the agitation of this matter after the President's message.

First, the Ways and Means Committee gave an extensive hearing to all parties at interest. It heard the supposed Cuban planter, the Cuban merchant, the Cuban banker, the sugar trust, the beet-sugar producer, the Louisiana cane-sugar producer, the Hawaiian and the Porto Rican planter; and then it was rumored after all of these interests had been heard, that there was not sufficient Republican votes on the Ways and Means Committee to bring the measure out of that committee. It was known that some Democrats on that committee favored the passage of this bill. Yet so anxious were the Republican leaders that they should have all the credit for this legislation that they were not willing to avail themselves of the votes of these Democrats in order to bring this bill to the consideration of the House. Then followed Republican caucuses.

In the first one, a majority of the Republicans seemed to be opposed to the measure, and then delay was asked by those who advocated the bill. The President took a hand in the matter, and one by one the recalcitrants were called to the White House, and then another caucus was held by the Republicans, with no better result than the first; then Governor Wood came on to Washington, and the sugar-trust agents flocked about the Capitol, and another caucus resulted; and then a fourth, and then a fifth caucus, and it was not until the last caucus held by the Republican party on this subject that a majority of the Republicans could be secured to support this bill.

During all of this agitation the reasons for this measure were predicated upon the suffering of the people of Cuba, the relief of which was intended to be brought about through it. No effort was made to have this measure considered until it was certain that its Republican paternity was well established to all men of this great Republic.

You all recall that after this measure had been agreed upon, as a Republican measure in a Republican caucus, upon the recommendation of a Republican President and Republican officials, that the Committee on Rules debated long and seriously whether they should not force this bill through the House under the whip and spur of a rule limiting debate and limiting amendments. But to the credit of the Democrats and those Republicans who stand by the domestic sugar producer the rule was made impossible.

The Republican leaders knew full well that such a rule could not be put through the House against the wishes of the friends of the domestic sugar producer on the Republican side and the united forces of Democracy on the floor. So that, for the first time since I have been a member of Congress, this bill came into the Committee of the Whole House as a Republican measure without limit either as to debate or as to amendments, and yet there are gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who contend that this is a Democratic measure. I say to them that the history of the measure flies in the face of that contention. But that is not all of the history of the Republican paternity of this measure. Let me call your attention to the message of the President made to this Congress, and to the recommendations contained therein.

Apart from the recommendation of the passage of this bill by the President, 36 recommendations have been made to Congress. Of the 36 recommendations up to this moment only one of them has been pressed by this Republican Administration to a conclusion. That is the establishment of a permanent Census Bureau. Every other recommendation either lies dormant in divers committee rooms or is suspended between the House and the Senate.

In a desire to carry any of these recommendations has the President exercised the well-known pressure that he has exercised in this matter to bring about its culmination by the enactment into law of his recommendations? He has not summoned members of his party to the bar of his court to pass so important a measure as a law for the suppression of anarchy in this country, though he himself became President as a result of the fact that anarchy had robbed this Republic of the life of his lamented predecessor; he has not called to the bar of his court members of his party on this floor to press the passage of a law to supervise the trusts and suppress them in this country, though the American people are groaning under the exorbitant exactions of this commercial anarchy; he has not seen fit to call his leaders on this floor to demand that they create a new Cabinet office, that the commerce and the industries may have a say and a vote in the council of his official family; no pressure to pass the eight-hour law for Government employees; no pressure to pass immigration laws demanded by organized labor in this country; no pressure to reduce the revenues which now increase the surplus in the Treasury daily, jeopardizing the commercial interests of our people; no pressure to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; no pressure for economy in Government expenditures; none for the protection of our forestry; none for the passage of irrigation laws for our brothers in the West; nothing to protect the public lands of Porto Rico; nothing to furnish the wherewith to construct the isthmian canal demanded by every section of the country and by every citizen of the Republic.

In fact, the whole power of this Administration has been devoted, in so far as it has the power to compel legislation in this body, for the one single purpose of passing this measure; and yet there are Democrats who stand on this floor and contend that this is a Democratic measure! For myself I can not understand that a Republican Administration should exercise all of its influence, bend all of its efforts, use all of its powers, to pass a measure that was not in keeping with the doctrines and the policy of its party, but intended to further the interest of the opposition party.

But gentlemen say that this bill is in keeping with tariff reform. I deny that. I deny it most emphatically, and the facts are so plain on that proposition that the wonder to me is how gentlemen can be so ingenious to present an argument on the other side of the question. Will this bill reduce the taxes of the people? I maintain, first, that genuine Democratic tariff reform must be upon the lines of giving cheaper goods to the American people. Is there any gentleman who contends on this floor that this measure will give to the American sugar consumer cheaper sugar than he is getting to-day? Not one.

The gentleman on the other side who made the first speech in behalf of this bill [Mr. PAYNE] said that it would not affect the price of sugar to the consumer. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] who, on this side, has led the fight in behalf of this bill has admitted that it would not reduce the price of sugar. Do gentlemen believe that we can make the people of this country think that by voting for a cut on the tariff that gives them no benefit at all—that such a measure is along the lines of genuine tariff reform? Do they believe they can go to their constituents and say, "I have cut 20 per cent on sugar," and expect the people of their districts to be so dull as not to understand when they go to the grocery store and have to pay the same price for sugar that they paid before the cut came, that there has been no genuine tariff reform effected by the passage of this bill.

As a tariff-reform measure, I contend that this bill is a myth, pure and simple. Genuine tariff reform does not consist exclusively in reducing rates, but it consists in reducing rates in such a way as to reduce the price of the article protected by the tariff. And that gentleman underestimates the intelligence of the American citizen when he believes that in the face of an admitted fact that a cut accomplished upon the tariff on a certain article will not reduce the price of it to the consumer, he is carrying out genuine tariff reform. In fact, the whole contention of the party pressing this measure is that there will be no reduction to the consumer.

Then the question resolves itself into this: Who is to get the advantage of this cut? Some one will benefit by it. Gentlemen on one side say the Cuban planter will get it. Gentlemen on the other side say the sugar trust will get it. But all agree that the consumer will not get the benefit of it. Which shall it be, will the Cuban planter get the benefit of the cut that you propose in this bill or will the sugar trust get it? I contend that the sugar trust will get the benefit of this 20 per cent reduction, and my reason for that can be stated in a few words.

The Cuban planter has but two markets wherein he may dispose of his sugar, the English market and the American market. The sugar trust is the only purchaser of raw sugar on the American market, and when the Cuban planter comes to dispose of his crop he has to accept one of two propositions, which I may explain in the following way:

The price of raw sugar is fixed at Hamburg. The price of raw sugar in England is the Hamburg price. The price of raw sugar in New York is the Hamburg price plus the transportation plus the tariff plus the differential. The Cuban planter has but the two markets within which he may dispose of his sugar. The English refiner says to him, "I will pay you the Hamburg price for your sugar delivered here." The American sugar trust says, "I will pay you the world's price for your sugar plus the tariff." The transportation from Cuba to England being higher than the transportation from Cuba to New York, the Cuban planter finds it advantageous to bring his sugar to New York and sell it to the sugar trust.

In that price the countervailing duty fixed by the law plays no part, and that was conceded by the gentleman from New York in his argument. Yet under all rules of commerce, if there was competition in purchasers for Cuban sugar on the New York market this countervailing duty properly belongs to the Cuban planter; but the sugar trust is in that position that it can withhold this countervailing duty from the Cuban planter, and does withhold it. If you reduce the tariff 20 per cent on Cuban sugar by the adoption of this measure you create a differential in favor of the Cuban planter, but as the trust has the power and does withhold the equivalent of the countervailing duty from the price paid the Cuban planter to-day, by the application of the same policy it can and will withhold this 20 per cent reduction of the present tariff rate on raw sugar, and the reason for that is obvious.

The Cuban planter is compelled to sell. He can not hold his crop; while the sugar trust is not compelled to buy the Cuban sugar. If the Cuban planter will not accept the offer of the trust, the trust can wait and the planter can not. It is true he has the alternative of taking his sugar to England, but there he comes in direct competition with German sugar. He now loses the advantage of the countervailing duty and will, after the passage of this act, lose the advantage of the 20 per cent reduction. He will lose still further, by taking his sugar to England, a difference in the cost of transportation between the rate from Cuba to New York and the rate from Cuba to England. Even after the trust insists upon appropriating this 20 per cent he will find it to his advantage to go to the New York market in preference to the English market, for in that way he will save the difference in the freight rates.

Now, will gentlemen contend that the trust, being the only purchaser, will not insist upon appropriating to itself this entire 20 per cent reduction if this bill passes? If without the assistance of legislation on the subject it now appropriates the countervailing duty, which of right belongs to the Cuban planter, with how much more reason will it appropriate the 20 per cent fixed by this act?

But we of Louisiana know by bitter experience that that will be the result of your legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BREAZEALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of my colleague be extended fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague be extended for fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN. With the understanding that the time of the other speakers will be correspondingly extended, I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman does not object.

Mr. COCHRAN. I do not object, but I think in fairness if that rule is adopted it should go down the line.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. The gentleman does not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman does not object.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The price of sugar in New Orleans is predicated upon the New York price. Yet three-sixteenths of a cent a pound is taken off from that price because the sugar trust, the only purchaser we have, contends that the freight rate from New Orleans to New York is three-sixteenths of a cent a pound; and, singular to say, not a pound of that sugar goes to New York, but the trust has a refinery in New Orleans, and from there disposes of every pound that is produced in the State of Louisiana.

If they have the power to cut off three-sixteenths of a cent on every pound of sugar we produce, will any gentleman explain to me why, with the assistance of the Congress of the United States in passing this legislation, they will not be able to tell the Cuban planter, "We will pay you the New York price for your sugar plus the tariff that is charged, but as they have cut 20 per cent off the $1.685 for 96 sugar, we demand that you surrender to us this 20 per cent of $1.68¾ allowed you by your reciprocity treaty with the United States?"

Remember it is argued here that the Cuban planter is in a worse financial fix than the Louisiana planter. But the Louisiana planter can not wait. Will the Cuban planter, in a worse financial fix than his Louisiana brother, be able to wait? All are compelled to sell, and the sugar trust is not compelled to buy. If the trust falls short on the refined article it can turn to the overproduction of Germany and France and Austria-Hungary and get the sugar to supply the deficiency, and so the Louisiana planter is compelled to sell.

The Cuban planter, if he be worse off than the Louisiana planter financially to-day, will be compelled to deduct this 20 per cent granted by the American Congress and to take for his sugar, just as the Louisiana planter does, the price which the sugar trust is willing to give him, and the 20 per cent allowed by Congress alleged to be in behalf of the Cuban planter will go into the pockets of the sugar trust. The Cuban planter can not sell to anybody but the American sugar trust. So that this bill will really place in the pockets of this gigantic trust more than $6,000,000 on the present sugar crop alone, which amount properly belongs to the United States Treasury.

If some gentleman can tell me to whom the Cuban planter can sell his sugar in this country except the sugar trust, I shall be glad to know it, and I can promise him that he will be looked upon as a prophet among my people, and, whether this bill passes or does not pass, he will become the prophet of the Cuban people as well.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is the gentleman aware that there is a telegram from the president of the Sugar Growing Association of Louisiana stating that the planters down there are giving away their seed, that some are plowing up their stubble, and that the insurance companies are canceling policies on the sugar houses or raising the insurance rates 25 per cent within the last two or three weeks?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am aware of that of my own knowledge, and I am glad the gentleman asked that question. My brothers and myself are interested in a sugar plantation in Louisiana, and this year we have taken the seed and rid ourselves of it, and we have plowed up the stubble field and planted the plantation in rice; not because we believed the sugar planter in Cuba would get the benefit of this 20 per cent, but because we knew that no matter who got this 20 per cent in so far as we are concerned the passage of this bill meant 20 per cent reduction on our sugars, for our only purchaser, the sugar trust, would say to us, "We now charge you a freight rate we do not have to pay, because if you will not sell to us at that rate in New Orleans you will have to pay the freight to New York and there sell to us, so now we tell you we will likewise deduct this 20 per cent, and your remedy is to move your sugar to New York and there sell to us in competition with the Cuban product, which we get 20 per cent cheaper since the reciprocity between Cuba and the United States."

I will say to the gentleman that a refinery in the town of Franklin, within 20 miles of my residence, the home of Senator Foster, that cost $589,000, was sold the other day for $47,000, with a view, it is reported, of tearing up the machinery and carrying it to Cuba. I am giving these facts which are within my own knowledge, and yet gentlemen tell us we are not being hurt in this country by this 20 per cent reduction.

In my own parish over 50 per cent of the production of last year has been cut down, and on the highways you may to-day find the seed cane intended to produce the wealth of that State. That is the way it is down there. But I am not appealing to gentlemen here to help us, to take us up. I am merely pleading for justice in behalf of an industry established in that State for over a hundred years, receiving the recognition of all parties—Democrats, Whigs, and Republicans—from 1789 to the present day. From the first tariff act, enacted on the 4th day of July, 1789, to this day there has been a tariff on sugar, not merely for its protection, gentlemen, but for the purpose of producing revenue for the Government.

And it is conceded that this 20 per cent reduction will not reduce the price of sugar to the consumer, but will cut the revenue of the Government $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 this year and twice as much next year if the production of sugar in Cuba increases in proportion as it has since the war has terminated on that island. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] the other day stated that the year after the war 300,000 tons of sugar were produced on that island, last year 600,000, and this year 900,000, and that next year, if we take the production of 1894 for comparison, the year that the people of Cuba were not at war with the people of Spain, it will produce over 1,000,000 tons of sugar if properly developed as it is ostensibly pretended that the bill here proposes to do.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN], after quoting Jefferson in support of the doctrine of reciprocity and feeling the weakness of his contention by his inability to show any treaty negotiated by Jefferson, either when a Cabinet officer or as President of the United States, undertakes to prove that reciprocity is Democratic on the ground that it tends to cut the rate of tariff fixed by the law, and in that contention he is ably supported by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I contend that the argument is false, and the reason of its falsity is apparent. Under Democratic doctrine it is contended that only such tariff can be imposed as will produce sufficient revenue to economically administer the Government. If a cut of the tariff is brought about by reciprocity, one of two things must result. Either a deficiency in the Treasury proportionate with the cut and in keeping with the articles brought into this country under that treaty, or a raise of tariff on articles coming from other countries.

Reciprocity is essentially predicated upon the doctrine that the tariff collected in the custom-houses exceed the needs of the Government economically administered, for if there is no surplus in the Treasury there can be no cut without the danger of deficiency, and the consequent bankruptcy of the Government. If there is a surplus justifying a cut the Democratic remedy is not in the maintainance of a high tariff and the cutting off of a portion of it by reciprocity treaties, but the Democratic remedy is the reduction of the tariff along all of the lines and in behalf of all of the countries trading with this country.

Can a gentleman answer this argument? And just so as the proposed legislation is only considered because there is a surplus in the Treasury now, and the Republicans propose to reduce that revenue by this false system of tariff reform, giving the advantage of one country over all others in amity with the United States and crippling one American industry to give unjust advantage to others, just so when this doctrine is reciprocated by the Cuban Republic in order to carry out the condition imposed upon her by this measure will it be compelled to enact a tariff law which will produce more revenues than necessary to economically administer the government of that Republic or adopt the protective tariff system.

For, just in proportion as we derive advantage from this reciprocity treaty, in that exact ratio will the duties on goods coming from other countries into Cuba bear the burden of the concession to us. Is that not a fact? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] says that the gentlemen on the Republican side who are supporting this bill are infused with 20 per cent of Democracy. I deny that; but, if it be true, does not the gentleman himself propose to carry the Republican doctrine of a tariff in excess of the needs in revenue of the Government somewhere else, and nolens volens to impose upon a free Republic compulsory Republican tariff legislation?

Admitting that Republicans advocating this measure are infused with 20 per cent of Democracy, they still remain believers in a protective tariff to the extent of 80 per cent. So that while the gentleman is not improving conditions here on the lines of Democratic tariff reform, as contended for by him, he is compelling the people of Cuba to adopt the same system in Cuba that he complains of as robbery in this country. It is a most singular way of propagating one's faith in Democratic doctrine to so shape events that at one fell swoop he compels every Cuban elected to the Cuban congress and the Cuban president to become Republicans in fact, whether they believe in the doctrines of the Republican party or not. He can not get away from this proposition. I contend that if he wants the Democratic plan of tariff in this country he ought to be willing to apply it to Cuba. What is good for the American Republic ought to be good for the sister republic.

If 20 per cent is added to the necessary tariff to economically administer the Government of this country, the gentleman calls it robbery. If it is robbery here, it is robbery in Cuba. This difference exists, however, between the robbery here and the robbery there, and that is, that this country is self-imposed and voluntary, the power of taxation being in the hands of the representatives of the people on this floor; but in Cuba, if this measure is carried out, the robbery will be compulsory, because, in order to get this treaty enacted, 20 per cent will have to be added to whatever tariff rate is necessary to produce the revenue to carry on the Government of Cuba economically administered.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is highway robbery over there and petty larceny here. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROUSSARD. I accept the amendment. [Laughter.] Now, I say that under Democratic rule, under Democratic tariff enactment, there is no room for reciprocity—none whatever. There can be none. Because the very moment you admit that the tariff rate is too high, then the duty of the Democrat is not to enact reciprocity treaties, but to reduce the rate so that a surplus shall not accumulate in the Treasury. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, if it were clear that the people of the United States were to get the benefit of this reduction, or if it were clear that the people of Cuba were to get the benefit of this reduction, there might be some excuse for Democrats on this floor joining the Republicans in their political policy and in this administrative measure. And yet, if that were so, as I understand the Democratic policy of tariff, that would hardly be excusable. I know there was a time when the Democrats, or that branch of the Democratic party called the Cleveland Democrats, contended that in this country we should have free raw materials and a tariff on the finished product in order to encourage manufactures in the United States. That doctrine struck the country Democrats with such an unfavorable impression of its innate wrong that that proposition was fought out in our conventions and in this Hall. Republicans were so unkind as to charge that President Cleveland advocated free raw material because he and his friends owned some great Nova Scotia coal fields and wished to get the product into the United States free of duty. Democrats, generally from the body of the country, contended that free raw material was not a Democratic doctrine, as in such cases the benefits of the tariff, if any, went into the pockets of the already highly protected manufacturers, and did not necessarily reduce the price to the consumer. Mr. Cleveland's policy was repudiated by the Democratic party.

I very well remember that our brilliant leader, Mr. BAILEY, stated most clearly upon this floor that the Democratic doctrine is that if there is any benefit in the distribution of the revenue tariff to industries in this country, then every farmer, every producer of the so-called raw material is entitled to his share of the protection; that if it is a burden, he is entitled to bear his proportion of the burden. Now, what is it that we are dividing upon on this side of the House? If the question is, Shall we take the tariff off the raw material imported from a foreign country, made by foreign labor, and leave the tariff on the finished product, and bring it over for the protection of the already unreasonably protected manufacturers of this country, then certainly that is not Democratic. You will bear in mind that we already have a differential duty in this country in favor of the sugar refiners that the Democrats have been fighting for years. We have got a low tariff now made at the dictation of the sugar trust on the raw material, simply that the trust may refine sugar at a profit, and leave the much higher tariff on the finished product, so that the American people may not have reduction on the sugar they consume.

Our friends, it seems to me, have made the most serious mistake that I have seen the great party make since I have been in this House. We found yesterday our friend from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], standing here with a bland smile on his face, looking the Republicans on the other side of the aisle in the eye and saying, "My Republican friends, you are gulping down a dose of 20 per cent of Democracy." Did not the gentleman see at the same time that he was gulping down 80 per cent of Republicanism? He was insisting on taking a tariff off a field product for a manufacturer, and insisting in the same bill that we should fetter the people of Cuba with an American statute that made them mendicants to our Government. The gentleman will please excuse us from the West if we contend that it is not Democratic to take the tariff off the raw sugar the farmer grows and leave the much higher tariff on the refined product that he consumes, making it impossible to get cheaper sugar. He must pardon us if we repudiate this new tariff departure which takes the tariff off of what we produce and sell and leaves the high tariff on everything we buy, even to the refined sugar made from our beets. He will be patient with us if we balk at casting a vote in this case as invited by the sugar barons and the Republican organization under the false assumption that this is Democratic doctrine. Nothing is Democratic that makes the chairman of the national Republican committee, Mr. HANNA, chuckle, as he did when you joined him cheek by jowl in obeying the dictates of the sugar trust and closed our mouths in the coming campaign as to this infamy.

The gentlemen further contend that they are voting for this simply because it reduces the tariff. I want to say to our friends if, as Democrats, their only object in reducing the tariff is to lower the figures in the schedule without reducing the price to our consumers—if it has no more substance than that, then for heaven's sake let the figures stand where they are and do not attempt to deceive the people. This is a mere will-o'-the-wisp, a rainbow chase after gaudy shadows; but it reacts on the farmers of the West by intimidating those seeking to develop sugar beets.

We are told by the leaders on both sides that there is to be no reduction to the consumer in the United States. It seems to me that would be sufficient to prevent any Democrat from walking over and joining hands in forcing the passage of the political policies of the Republican party. I ask our friends, Why have a Democratic party? What is the use of having a Democratic party if, when the Administration brings forth its political policy, we are to go at breakneck pace and join them and pass those political policies? It is admitted that this bill, if passed, will take $6,000,000 in revenue from our Treasury; that a large part of it will go into the hands of the sugar trust, to be distributed as it sees fit. If this bill passes, Democrats are responsible for it. If the two parties only differ in little formal measures, then why keep up two organizations?

I want to say to you that it should have been sufficient when the astute General DICK, in the Republican caucus, said: "My fellow Republicans, pass this bill and you will see strung out in front of every Democratic campaign committee on the next election, 'Gentlemen, here is your tariff for the trusts, and there is your free trade for the farmer.'" This epigram from this sagacious politician states the whole case. You take the tariff from a field product and hand it over to a sugar trust, without touching the tariff on refined sugar, in which the consumer is interested. Colonel DICK overestimated this side of the House. He thought the Democratic party would be eager and anxious to take advantage of the opportunity and say to the country that we are anxious to reduce the tariff on refined sugar; we are eager to reduce the tariff on the sugar that goes to the consumer, but, by the gods, we will make no further reduction on raw sugar, the price of which goes into the pockets of the American Sugar Refining Company. But he had forgotten Grant's prophecy of our party. You are taking the raw material that has a differential already estimated, under the manipulations, at nearly 40 per cent less than the refined product, put on the sugar schedule at the dictation of the American sugar trust, for the sole use and benefit of the sugar trust.

One might well think from the eagerness with which Democratic leaders vie with Republican leaders in serving this trust that in the future it will be perfectly safe whichever party is in power, and the trust may be relieved of an enormous contribution to the Republican campaign fund. Why pay when help is so willing? The fact that the floor leaders of both parties are trying to give the American Sugar Refining Company a greater differential on raw sugar, without disturbing the much higher rate on refined sugar, has encouraged other manufacturing trusts. A few moments ago you witnessed the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] devoting all of his speech in favor of removing the duty from hides, leaving a high tariff on leather for the leather trust and shoemakers of his State. He can see no reason why the sugar trust should be given freer raw material without giving also the leather trust freer raw material.

I wish to sound the warning here and now that there is and will be no Democrats from the great West who will subscribe to the new doctrine of the amalgamated leaders of the parties, "Protection for the fostered manufacturers and free trade for the farmer and producer of raw material." As long as we are forced to pay a high tariff on everything we buy we shall contend for a like rate on what we have to sell. When the day of reduction is at hand, we shall gracefully submit to the general cut.

I suppose that those members who do not come from sugar-producing States may keep their people in ignorance of the true significance of this proposition. But I want to say to you that there are 20 States and Territories in this Union that are growing sugar beets. This is a farm product; and those men who love the memory of Jefferson so much, who sing the song of Jefferson's principles year in and year out, seem to forget for the moment what was an ideal of his life. He even doubted whether he wanted ever to have a great manufacturing center. He said, "While we can keep our people in the country, we can keep them patriotic, we can keep them honest, we can keep them true; but if we have to pile them up on top of one another in great cities, corruption will come, government will deteriorate, and then trouble will follow." He never expected any of his followers would ever be dragging tariff from the raw material of a field product and shoving it down into the pockets of protected manufacturers. He expected the followers of Hamilton to do this.

Now, my friends, in 1867, when William D. Kelley, known as "Pig Iron Kelley," stood on the platform in Milwaukee talking of the great industries of this country, he said: "Gentlemen, I want to make a forecast now, that before a half century passes away the great Northwest will be growing sugar for the State of Louisiana." The people who heard him laughed at him. But, sir, he knew this country as a child knows his alphabet. He said: "From here to the high elevations of the Rocky Mountains you can grow the sugar beet as successfully as they can in Germany, as they can in France, as they can in any country of Europe." Professor Tassig confirmed his opinion of the possibilities of our soil and climate, but said it would be deferred till our lands were divided and every man would not have an abundance of land over which to ride machines. That time is now here.

Now, my friends, we have just got started; we were surprising the world when this monster stepped in here and checked our progress; we have succeeded in getting into the office of the Secretary of Agriculture a real farmer who is with us heart and soul; we have succeeded in getting a man there who puts forth his every effort to grow in this country what we consume here. He said: "Give me ten years, and I shall keep at home the $100,000,000 now going out of this country for sugar." He sent his experts to every part of the country trying to disseminate the production of rice in the South, of tea in South Carolina, and of sugar in the Northwest. And what does it mean? In my district last year we produced nearly 20,000 tons of refined sugar. Two years prior we did not produce a pound. In the State there are now building three new plants, costing nearly a million dollars each. The Agricultural Department has just reported that arrangements are being consummated in Colorado to build seven more plants this year and throughout the United States that $49,000,000 is raised for the purpose of developing this beet industry in the United States. Last year the sugar production from beets in the United States increased 140 per cent over the year before. I here append a report of Mr. Saylor, expert of the Government, as to the present status and the future prospect of the industry, viz:

[The Washington Post.]

THE MAKING OF BEET SUGAR—DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE EXPERT MAKES REPORT ON THE INDUSTRY.

C. F. Saylor, the special agent in charge of the beet-sugar investigations of the Department of Agriculture, is in Washington making his annual report. He made public yesterday the following figures regarding the industry during the past year:

The total production of beet sugar in the United States in the season 1901-2 has aggregated 185,000 tons, an increase of 140 per cent from the 77,000 tons produced during the season of 1900-1901. There were 31 factories in operation in 1900, according to the census figures, and 11 more were started in 1901. There are 9 factories in course of construction for operation in 1902, as follows: Sebewaing, Carrollton, Mount Clements, and Croswell, Mich.; Shelby, Ind.; Greely, Eaton, and Fort Collins, Colo., and Phoenix, Ariz., ranging in capacity of daily output from 500 tons to 1,000, the latter figure being the capacity at the Phoenix plant.

Other companies have been organized with a total capitalization of $49,000,000, and would require annually a working capital in addition of $9,080,000. According to Special Agent Saylor they would purchase from the farmer annually beets to the amount of $14,700,000, besides many other crude materials. The number and aggregate capital of these prospective plants, by States, follow:

Arizona 2, $1,500,000; California 5, $3,500,000; Colorado 7, $5,000,000; Indiana 1, $1,000,000; Iowa 6, $3,100,000; Idaho 1, $500,000; Michigan 28, $14,900,000; Minnesota 5, $2,400,000; Montana 1, $500,000; New York 2, $1,500,000; New Jersey 1, $500,000; North Dakota 2, $1,000,000; Ohio 3, $1,350,000; Oregon 1, $500,000; Pennsylvania 1, $500,000; South Dakota 2, $1,000,000; Utah 3, $2,500,000; Wisconsin 10, $3,150,000; Wyoming 2, $1,500,000.

Now, our friends ask whether we appeal to the balance of the country for the protection of our special industry. I say yes, if we can do it without injury to them. In France not only was this industry protected but the Government itself grew beets, whatever the price, until the industry got on its feet. The German Empire has nursed the industry until thoroughly developed.

But we have not asked you in this case to protect us; and I shall say here and now that if we could be guaranteed to-morrow that this 20 per cent cut would be the last, that the reduction would cease at this point, and if capital should understand this fact we in Colorado would not care the snap of our fingers for the "cut." It is the intimidation of capital and the fear of the future that retards our progress. The growers will say if this trust can drive you to a reduction of 20 per cent on raw sugar for the trust alone, it will continue to drive you. But I want to say that you are now destroying this industry just as rapidly as possible without benefiting anybody materially except the sugar trust, which refines the raw sugar.

Let us get this clearly before the American people. There is a very high tariff on refined sugar to keep the European product up, ostensibly for the benefit of the home sugar growers and for revenue purposes. Through the influence of the American Sugar Refining Company a much less tariff is placed on raw sugar to induce the shipping here for refining. This American Sugar Refinery is practically the only purchaser of raw sugar. It pays immense salaries and very large dividends on much watered stock. It now demands, ostensibly in the interest of Cuba, an additional reduction of 20 per cent on raw sugar from Cuba. This will take $6,000,000 from the revenue of this Government on the present stock. The whole benefit will go into the hands of the American sugar refineries, the only purchasers. What are they going to do with it? They say distribute it among the sugar planters of Cuba. Who are the great sugar growers of Cuba? The members of the American sugar refineries, and therefore we take $6,000,000 from our Treasury and give to the American sugar refineries to distribute largely among their members as sugar growers of Cuba. And yet we are told that such pilfering is Democratic. I deny it. I denounce it.

The newspaper men follow these things up pretty closely, and they have kept track of the influence of every act of this body, and what it has done. Every act that you have done in this body or at the other end of the Capitol has depressed the sugar beet. It has not reduced the price of refined sugar; but every act in the direction that this bill points has made the stock of the sugar trust jump by millions. Why is this so? Why is it if the sugar trust is to get no benefit that with every move made here in the direction of the pending legislation the sugar-trust stock jumps upward and forward?

This legislation is in the interest of the sugar trust alone, just as the legislation for reciprocity with Hawaii was. It seems to me this consideration ought to be sufficient for the Democrats in this House. At the dictation of the sugar barons of Hawaii and others we in this House gave "reciprocal relations" until Hawaii took out of our Treasury $98,000,000 before being admitted into the Union.

Operation of the treaty between the Hawaiian Islands and the United States, under which their sugar was admitted free of duty.

It is true that the people who received the benefit of this are said to have put from a half a million to a million annually into the Republican campaign fund. But I do not see that that is any reason why Democrats should jump to the rescue of this great trust. If you continue you will discourage the trust from contributing to Republican campaign funds. You will do their work gratis.

Now, let us see what effect the action on this bill has had. Here is Mr. Sherman G. Palmer's résumé, January 15, 1902:

WAR OF THE SUGAR TRUST.

Chronology of 1901-2 events.

Benefits to Cuba if bill passes	0
Benefit to sugar trust	$6,000,000
Loss to United States revenues	6,000,000

American sugar industry.

STARTING POINT.

Valuation of sugar trust refineries	$30,000,000
Capitalization of sugar trust	75,000,000

First event.—Sugar trust increases its capital stock to $90,000,000.

Second event.—Sugar trust starts war of prices against Pacific coast beet-sugar producers by cutting prices one and a half.

Third event.—Sugar trust starts war of prices in the Missouri Valley against the Colorado, Nebraska, and Utah beet-sugar producers.

Fourth event.—Sugar trust's literary bureau starts to working up popular sentiment favoring tariff reduction on Cuban sugar, of which it is the sole purchaser.

Fifth event.—Sugar trust packs the "reciprocity convention" and the beet-sugar producers bolt it.

Sixth event.—First week in January, 1902, sugar-trust stock sells at $116½ common, $115 preferred, making value of total issue $104,062,500.

Seventh event.—January 15, 1902, Committee on Ways and Means commence hearing testimony concerning "Cuban relief."

Eighth event.—March 15, sugar-trust stock sells at $126½ common, $117½ preferred; value of total issue, $109,575,000; net increase in value, $5,512,500.

Ninth event.—March 18, majority of House Republicans on Committee on Ways and Means adopt bill favoring 20 per cent tariff reduction on Cuban sugars and other products.

Tenth event.—March 22, sugar-trust stock sells at $133½ common, $119½ preferred; value of total issue, $113,737,500; net increase since ninth event, $4,162,500, and since the sixth event, $9,675,000.

Now, that comes pretty near telling the story. Who is getting this benefit? It is the sugar trust and the sugar trust alone that is getting the bulk of it. I want to suggest to our friends another thing. You are not doing a thing for the American consumers. You are not doing a beneficial act to the Cuban people. The good you are doing is to the sugar trust and the great planters of Cuba. Now, I want to suggest to our Democratic friends who run forward to grasp a Republican measure and strike down our industries to see what the Democratic papers of the great West think of it. We are not very large out there, but according to the report of the Agricultural Department this industry is now established in 20 States and Territories, and Colorado, our State, ranks in production this year next to Michigan. Now, let us see what your conduct here has done. We are now building four sugar factories. Here is a dispatch to the Rocky Mountain News, the leading Democratic paper west of the river, on April 7, which I would like every Democrat to consider, it being dated at Fort Collins, where they are building one of these big plants:

For some months past experts in the employ of the Havemeyers have been quietly making a thorough and systematic investigation of the Colorado fields. They report that the Colorado soil and climate was the best in the world for sugar beets and that independent companies were starting factories all over the State.

Now, our factories, some of them, are owned by the Oxnards. The others are owned by local and outside independent capital. I believe we have got eight now about ready to run, and it costs about $1,000,000 to build a factory with a capacity of 1,000 tons a day and half a million to build one with a capacity of 500 tons a day. Continuing, the dispatch says:

The Havemeyers were afraid that a few years might develop very dangerous competition, and decided that in order to protect themselves they must own the Colorado factories. They have already completed arrangements for controlling interest in the Eaton. The Greely Company at first refused to sell. The Havemeyers said that if the Greely people absolutely refused to sell, then Greely would have two factories. Negotiations are now in progress for a factory at Loveland. The owners of Loveland factory want to sell for one million. The Havemeyers have submitted a proposition to add one million, making a two-million plant, arranged for 5,000 acres of beets, and to allow the home people to maintain their stock, the only condition being that the Havemeyers should control and sell the product.

It goes on further and states that in the evening they unanimously decided they would have to sell. Then he went further to the Loveland plant and gave them their option to sell or fight. Now, here is the editorial of the News that came this morning:

COLORADO, Sunday, April 13.

The raid of the sugar trust on the independent sugar factories in this State was made possible only by the announcement by the National Administration favoring a reduction in the tariff on raw cane sugar anywhere from 20 per cent to 50 per cent of the present impost. When President Roosevelt declared himself in favor of that reduction, the independent beet-sugar makers felt that the power of the Administration would be used to make it a fact, and the additional reductions on the plea of helping Cuba or an annexation of the island and the consequent admission of sugar free of duty might be dreaded as a possibility in the future. With the club in their hands, the agents of the trust came to Colorado, beat the people of Fort Collins into submission, and now are trying to bulldoze the people of Eaton and Greely and the owners of Loveland out of their factories.

Does the Democratic party want to become a handmaid of Havemeyer's? Whether you desire these acts or not, you are directly encouraging them. You are aiding and abetting the sugar trust in its onslaught on the infant beet industry without a promise or prospect of a single benefit to your people. We feel the heavy hand of the Democrats because it is by their act that our industries are stifled. We complain of them because they are doing the unnatural, the unheard of, undemocratic act of going to the rescue of the Republicans after they have failed to carry their Administration and purely political measure.

Continuing, the News says:

The purpose of the trust is to get control of all independent beet-sugar factories, so as to kill organized opposition to further reduction of the duty on all cane sugar, and so as to stop the growth of the industry in this State, even though the tariff be not reduced more than 20 per cent.

Now, gentlemen, that has taken place in the last two weeks. It has taken place because the sugar trust, encouraged as it has been both by Democrats and Republicans on this floor, has no doubt of its power to reduce this tariff further and to get raw sugar into this country practically free of duty. Now, it seems to me that our organization on this side of the House, if we had been careful, if we had come together and figured with one another, if we had conferred in time before we joined the Republican party, that so many of you would not have committed such mistakes as we are committing.

Colorado repudiates the doctrine of "a high tariff for everything the great manufacturer sells and a very little or no tariff on the raw material that it buys, and a very high tariff on all the farmers buy and a very low tariff or none upon what the farmers produce or sell," under the pretense of free raw material. We object to having raw sugar selected for a reduction of the tariff, while continuing the present high tariff on all things that the sugar producer buys. Equality is equity in revising the tariff as well as elsewhere. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] is recognized for twenty minutes.

[Mr. COCHRAN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WARNOCK having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. CROOK, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

On April 15, 1902:

H. R. 3084. An act for the relief of bona fide settlers in forest reserves;

H. R. 11409. An act to authorize the construction of a traffic bridge across the Savannah River from the mainland within the corporate limits of the city of Savannah to Hutchinsons Island, in the county of Chatham, State of Georgia;

H. R. 184. An act to establish and provide for a clerk for the circuit and district courts of the United States, held at Wilmington, N. C.; and

H. J. Res. 173. Joint resolution to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue certain temporary permits.

RECIPROCITY WITH CUBA.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HENRY C. SMITH] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I am not persuaded that this bill is of value to this country or that it will be of aid or assistance to Cuba. The general scope of this bill, in substance and in effect, is that if Cuba will pass certain laws granting to the United States an advantage in the reduction of the tariff rates on the products of the United States passing into Cuba, and will by its legislative power enact immigration and exclusion laws of the same force and effect as those of the United States, and will establish an independent government, and will maintain that government and maintain those tariff schedules and maintain the labor laws and the exclusion laws, that then, in consideration of this conduct on the part of Cuba, the United States will reduce its tariff rates on the things raised in Cuba coming to the United States 20 per cent.

In other words, if Cuba will do these things that the United States requires, then the United States will give her 20 per cent advantage over the other countries of the world. And for how long? For the briefest of periods. The act provides that it shall not in any case extend beyond the 1st day of December, 1903. And we are asked to do this for humanity's sake. And the claims of Cuba upon us are so strong, so says the committee, that we are urged to pass this law even before Cuba has a government, anticipating before, in the law, there is any Cuba.

In fact, there is serious doubt in the minds of many whether such a law would be valid. The sovereign power in Cuba to-day rests in the United States. When the Spanish flag went down, the Stars and Stripes went up. When Spanish power went out, the power and authority of the United States came in. This is the law of nations, the law of the world. And the sovereignty will remain in the United States until the United States parts with that sovereignty.

Now, just contemplate for a minute Cuba, an independent nation, buying her independence, the very first step in her life as an independent nation, surrendering her independence and submitting to permit the United States to dictate the laws she shall make. Now, if it should turn out that this bill, in any form, shall pass this body, and shall pass the Senate, and shall go down to Cuba, I apprehend, as I read the history of that brave and courageous people, that we may anticipate fairly that these men who have made such a gallant fight for all these years against the tyranny of Spain will hesitate and debate some and discuss at some length before that little Republic shall consent that the great United States shall dictate to it the kind of laws that it shall execute—the kind of laws under which it shall live and thrive.

And if it does discuss this proposition, and there is as much contention and as much want of harmony among the people of Cuba upon the question as to whether it is of any benefit to them or not, whether it is a proper law for them to enact, whether they will reap any benefit from it, whether they want to go into that kind of thing or not, then it will be six months or a year before they will be in a condition to enact our exclusion laws—to enact laws similar to ours with reference to people coming to the island—and upon those other propositions under the labor laws; and after all that is done and certified by the proper authorities to the President of the United States, and the President of the United States has become satisfied that they have a stable, independent government, that they have enacted labor laws of equal force as our own, that they have entered into an agreement whereby they will grant trade concessions to us equivalent to ours, then the President of the United States is to make a proclamation, and from that time on they are to have the benefit of this wonderful boon and favor. And what is it if it is ever done?

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] demonstrated here as clearly as it can be proven, it seems to me, that the planters away down in Cuba, after waiting all this year, may receive from the United States the munificent sum of $66 each. What do they give us, gentlemen, in return for what we give to them? If they get the whole of it, as Mr. STEVENS showed, what do they give to us? Here is a nation struggling for all these years against Spain, and it has at last obtained its independence. Now the first step in that independence of that bright young republic is to surrender her independence, as I have suggested, and to say that we who have been patriots, and who have been fighting as never people fought before, will allow the great United States to dictate to us the manner of laws we shall have, and how we shall live. And what excuse is there for it? Why, the excuse for it, as set forth by the chairman of this great committee, is that if Cuba shall be permitted to have laboring men go into her country that they will flock there from all corners of the earth, and they will engage in the business of raising cane and producing sugar, and they will flood the markets of the United States, and they will destroy the sugar-beet industry and the cane-sugar industry in the United States. In other words, they are required to enact our exclusion laws for the purpose of preventing them from growing and adding one to the number of their population. Why, think of it!

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] said we were setting the little republic up in housekeeping; just starting her up; and he smiled like a lover in his benevolence at starting this little republic up in housekeeping. I do not want him to be my guardian in housekeeping and to say just who I shall have come and visit me, just whom I shall get to make up my household, and just who shall go into the housekeeping business with me or who shall come in there. We say to Cuba, If you will conduct your affairs as we dictate, we will do business with you; if you will buy certain things we have to sell, we will do something for you to relieve your distress; if you will buy the trust-made steel, the trust beef, the trust glass, paints, and oils, and all the other things we want you to buy of us. And if you will not do this, then you can go your way. The effect of this bill is that Cuba can suffer, can go into bankruptcy, and can starve and suffer on until she will come to our terms. Why, if Cuba shall submit to any such terms as this, I am sorry, for one, that all the blood and treasure of the United States was ever used to liberate such a people. I have too high a regard for that brave young republic to believe that they will permit us to dictate the kind of laws they shall make, and dictate to them and say, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther. You can accept our bounty; we will give you 20 per cent reduction if you will agree to add not one number to your population, if you will agree to add nothing to your sugar business and other concerns."

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. In restraint of trade.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Yes; in restraint of trade and in restraint of humanity and everything. The chairman of this committee said that we were the guardian of this republic. "We rescued your property. When we came to you we found it in the hands of the worst tyrant the world ever knew, and we rescued it from the tyrant and we turned it over to you. We settled accounts. Now, after we have given you your property, you may go, but if you do not follow the policies that we dictate, the policies that we point out, you may go your way, and we will have nothing more to do with you; you can paddle your own canoe henceforth."

This is not the proposition suggested by the President in his message. Indeed, his suggestion was a reduction of the tariff and in such a manner as not to hurt or interfere with any American industry. He recognized the fact that it was to be a reduction of tariff and not a reciprocity measure. Reciprocity, as indicated by the President, is the handmaiden of protection; reciprocity begins where protection leaves off. It is an exchange of commodities produced by the United States, raised or made, for commodities not made or raised in the United States, with some other nation or power which has such commodities to exchange for those not made or produced by itself. The power of the President to bring about reciprocal agreements for trade is defined and set out in the Dingley law. And we have not been asked to instruct the President as to our views upon reciprocity with Cuba. And under the present bill the whole matter has dwindled to such small, narrow, and mean proportions as to hardly be worthy of serious consideration. Valueless to the United States, valueless to Cuba, if not even more—a humiliation. I had rather support a measure for absolute free trade between the two countries than to lend my indorsement to a measure which has dwindled into the insignificance surrounding this. It seems that the committee was willing to come down by degrees from 50 per cent to 20 per cent. It is a good deal like the proposition concerning Porto Rico before the last Congress. It is not the amount nor the result but the principle involved, the desire of some men to have their own way.

Now, how does this happen? As I understand it, Cuba has no local taxes or little if any. She has a little land tax, a little personal-property tax. Cuba lives on the internal revenue and on the customs and duties that are paid on goods that come in there. Now, suppose that all that Cuba receives she receives from the United States and we reduced that 20 per cent, then we reduce the revenue—we reduce what Cuba has to live and exist upon—20 per cent. She has 20 per cent less, that much less with which, if she gets all the products from us, to carry on her government. In other words, instead of this stimulating any trade between Cuba and the United States, Cuba's interest lies in the direction of buying somewhere else, buying from some country where they will get a larger amount of revenue, instead of buying from our country, where her revenues are reduced 20 per cent. Now, such is the law in its general scope.

I want to say that as far as I am concerned, and I think I speak the sentiment of my people, I am just as much disinterested in this subject as the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the committee, and more so. Indeed, he is perfectly safe; the beet-sugar factory in his district which he has so often mentioned will not suffer, for his State has just passed a law fixing a bounty upon the production of sugar. I believe I can speak judicially upon this proposition. There is not a beet-sugar factory in my district, and but a few sugar beets are raised there. No man in this House will go further than I will in generosity to help the bright young republic on her way to peace and plenty, on her way to add another star to the blue field of Old Glory. [Applause.] We are willing to help Cuba whether she is suffering or not. And we all rejoice that the suffering and misery seen there by my colleague, Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH, when he was there, has passed away, and we hope has passed away forever. This is plainly shown by all the proofs before the committee. My people believe, and I believe, that this is such a patriotic duty, such a patriotic pleasure, that every American—man, woman, and child, young and old, North and South, East and West—would like to have a hand in the good and generous deed. Make it a national affair, take the money from the Treasury and hand it to the real Cubans, not to the Spaniards, not to the rich planters, not to the sugar trusts. Bestow charity where charity is needed. I believe that the sentiment in my district is in favor of doing something for Cuba, and I believe that if we do something for Cuba we ought to do it in a royal way, we ought to do it in a manly way, we ought to do it in such a manner as that the blush of shame shall not come to the face of the Cuban when he receives it.

I tell you you can give alms to a beggar on the street in such a way that you will make him feel like a prince, and you can give a gift to a prince in such a way as to make him feel like a beggar. I have seen fathers give gifts or money to their children, intending to give it to them all the while, in such a manner as that it takes all the pleasure out of the gift and out of the receiving of the gift. Even some men treat their wives that way. [Laughter.]

They hang on to it and give it to them grudgingly. I heard a great orator say when you get ready to give a dollar, let it go; spend your money in a royal way; spend it as though every leaf on every tree were a greenback and you owned an unlimited forest. [Laughter.] That is the sentiment of my district about Cuba—to give it with a free hand, give them something so they will know they are getting it and so it will do some good. But the sentiment of my district is in opposition to giving anything to the sugar trust or any other trust combination. [Applause.]

According to my views, a Congressman represents his district and, in a sense, the interests of his State. In what I shall say I shall not attribute to any member anything but the noblest and best motives. And I was very pleased to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] say, what must have been understood by all, that no man should be criticised or his faith questioned because he honestly and conscientiously took the one side or the other of this proposition. When it comes to a question of following or failing to follow the lead of chosen leaders, right or wrong, as a test of political integrity, then is our party and then is our country in danger. In these days of combine and combinations the danger is the loss of the thinking, independent, responsible man.

We are for Cuba and we are for the Department of Agriculture, and for the opinion of Secretary Wilson as against the opinion and policies of Mr. Havemeyer or the sugar trust. [Applause.]

Secretary Wilson says that inside of five years—and he made this statement before the Committee on Agriculture, of which I have the honor to be a member—the richness of the sugar beet will be increased over 20 per cent, and he said:

I believe as certainly as I am standing here that inside of five years, if the sugar-beet industry is not interfered with, the United States will produce all the sugar that the United States can use.

Mr. Havemeyer says:

Give me a free hand, let me alone, let me have my way, pass such laws as I dictate, and inside of five years I will wipe the sugar-beet business off from the face of the earth.

As my friend from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] just said—and a Democrat is just as right as anyone else when he is right, the only trouble with the Democrat is that he is never right; at the right time [laughter]—but he was right in this when he said that Havemeyer said he did not care who it hurt.

Now, while that is in my mind, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] was appealing to the House and asking if we would join him in putting down the trust. I want to say to my friend that we will join him in putting down the trusts if he will follow out the suggestion of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. NAPHEN], a Democrat from the bright and intelligent city of Boston, providing for an amendment to the Federal Constitution giving the Congress of the United States the right to pass laws regulating and controlling trusts. Mr. NAPHEN introduced that resolution in the Fifty-sixth Congress and it was put to sleep by the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. A Republican member reported the resolution out of the committee, and I remember well that when the resolution was called only one Democrat on the other side had the manhood to stand up and vote in favor of amending the Constitution permitting Congress to regulate trusts.

I am one of the infant statesmen—one of the "sophomores." I am not one of the chosen leaders of the party. But I will tell you what I will do; I will vote for it. But you better quit using barbed-wire fence. Come to Adrian and get some Lamb woven-wire fence, Page steel-wire fence, not made nor controlled by the trusts, but standing above the trust and defying it.

Mr. COCHRAN. Have you any idea that a majority of your party would so vote?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I can not speak on that proposition. But I see that my time is fast going, and I must hurry on.

I do not want to say anything unkind of anyone. I do not intend to criticise this committee. But I wish to say that I am not one of those who believe that the Republican party is going to wreck and ruin. I can not see those ghosts that my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] saw coming up over the footboard and which he held up here to warn us—Democratic spooks! [Laughter.] He warned us of the possibility of Democratic victory—of the danger of our pitching into the Administration. He told us that every vote against this measure was a vote against the President. And he said that my friend and colleague, WM. ALDEN SMITH, as well as myself, was not "dry behind the ears." [Laughter.] Well, I will tell you one thing: I would rather be in that condition than dry in front of the ears or dry over the ears. [Laughter.] It is true we are young; and the gentleman from New York accused me of not having been here long. I am not to blame for that. I came here just as soon as the people would let me come. [Laughter.] And when I asked him a question, he said "Go 'way back and sit down; you are young and vealish."

Mr. PAYNE rose.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I am always glad to listen to the gentleman. He is my Congressman. I am proud of him. I am always glad to act with him when I think he is right, just as he is glad to act with the President when he thinks the President is right, and is ready to oppose him when he thinks he is wrong.

But I have always heard it is a good thing, when we are in doubt, to "search the Scriptures"—that good old book that we all read at our mother's knee—the book that is able to guide us aright in every path of life. That is my sheet anchor. On Sunday last I took this book down, and I began to look over these "vealy" statements, these sophomorical addresses, these college orations of these embryo statesmen. Do you know that the Saviour of the world was accused of that same thing of which the gentleman from New York has accused us here? He lived only thirty-three years on this earth. Had he appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and attempted to suggest any changes in the policy of that committee he would have been instructed by my friend from New York to "go 'way back and sit down." [Laughter.] And the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] would have said, "Me, too."

Was it not remarkable that the gentleman from Ohio said:

I would not stand 50 per cent; I would not stand 40 per cent; I would not stand 25 per cent; but 20 per cent, that is just exactly the figure which will not hurt the sugar business at home and will help the Cubans.

Is not that a little remarkable? Why, gentlemen, this great committee came within 5 per cent of losing the support of the gentleman from Ohio. I tell you gentlemen, it was a close call. Talk about your "divine ratio" of 16 to 1. Here we have an equally divine percentage—just 20 per cent. [Applause.]

But I must come back to what I was just about to read from the Scriptures:

Purge out, therefore, the old leaven, that ye may be a new paste, as ye are unleavened.

Therefore let us feast, not with old leaven nor with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.

[Applause.]

As I just said, I am not alarmed about the future of the Republican party in Michigan. Our Republicanism is rock rooted, as firm as our everlasting hills, as enduring as our wealth of mineral, as constant as our inland seas, which surround her as a zone of beauty. Why, the Republican party was born in Michigan—born in my district. Under the oaks at Jackson, in nature's cathedral, 'mid the songs of birds and the fragrance of flowers, our party was born. It was a birth of purity, and pure the party will continue. [Applause.]

Now, before I close I want to refer to what was said here in regard to my friend and colleague, WM. ALDEN SMITH. Let me say, gentlemen, there is nothing to be made by abusing us young fellows. We are going to be old some day. You are not going to get any converts by calling us pettifoggers and "embryo statesmen," or by telling us to "go 'way back and sit down." Nor is it necessary that you suggest to us that you will not let us stay here; that we are going to be defeated if we do not follow your lead and do what you suggest. Gentlemen, there is nothing to be made by heaping—I do not want to say abuse, but by using such language or terms as were used in regard to my brother and colleague, WM. ALDEN SMITH.

I always feel ready to defend and stand up for the Smith family. [Applause.] You know that in the Garden of Eden, when all were pure and sinless, the Lord said "We will start this thing right; we will call everybody Smith; and then, as soon as they begin to go wrong, we will call them PAYNE, or DALZELL, or something of that kind." [Laughter.]

But my friend here was mistaken when he talked about WM. ALDEN SMITH delivering a college oration that he had committed to memory. I want to tell you something about the college at which he graduated. He graduated in the school of common sense, in the school of experience, and he took a post-graduate course in the school of hard knocks. [Applause.]

A townsman, a neighbor of mine, when he was United States marshal of the State of Michigan, found that boy a barefooted boy selling newspapers and popcorn on the streets of a great city, supporting his widowed mother, and he was fascinated with him. He took an interest in him and got his mother's consent to take him to Lansing, the capital of the State of Michigan, had him appointed a page, and that boy went on from page to messenger, from messenger to clerk, from clerk to lawyer, from lawyer to business man, until he owns a block in the city of Grand Rapids and has been the general counsel of one of the largest railroads in this country, and he won his way unaided to the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] Without one hand to uplift or aid he came here, and by and by—he is a young man yet, but he is growing—when he gets dry behind the ears [laughter], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] will love, respect, and honor him as the State of Michigan loves, respects, and honors him today. [Applause.]

But as I was saying, this is a terribly little thing when you come to get down to it, isn't it? What is there left for a lot of big men, able-bodied men, a great committee of this House, to be bothered with? There is a question as to whether any Cuban planter will ever get one penny of benefit from this; and I want to say to you that if this was a Democratic measure in a Democratic House, originating on the other side of the Chamber as it naturally would, being a Democratic measure as I believe, I would like to hear my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and all these other gentlemen, ridiculing it out of the House. Do you know, every time I think of it my attention is called to this poem of Frank L. Stanton's, which I will read:

Sich a li'l' feller, en he settin' up so wise!
Say he like his daddy, but he got his mammy's eyes;
Angel tuk and drap him fum a window in de skies—
By-bye, honey, twell de mawnin'.
Sich a li'l' feller, in de cunnin'es' er close!
Say he love his daddy, but his mammy's what he knows!
Foun' him in de springtime, and dey tuck him fer a rose—
By-bye, honey, twell de mawnin'.
Sich a li'l' feller, en he talkin' like a man!
By-bye, by-bye, kiss yo' li'l' han';
Lots er li'l' chillun in de sleepy lan'—
By-bye, honey, twell de mawnin.

[Applause.]

That, my friends, is just about what the Cubans will think of this wonderful proposition, if it ever gets down there, in my judgment. But they say, and the reason they urge it here, is because they say the President of the United States wants it.

The friends of this measure try to get support for it on the claim that the President has his heart set upon its passage, and the friends of the bill have said that a vote against it is a vote against the President, and a vote against it is a slap at the Administration. I deny both. I deny that the President is tenacious about this bill.

Now, gentlemen, I want to submit that I deny that he wants it. I deny that it is at his heart to urge this, and I say that, according to my judgment, President Roosevelt is too grand, too noble, and too patriotic to ever attempt to force legislation through this body the way it is intimated; and if there is no other reason why this should become a law than that the President of the United States wants it, it ought not to become a law.

Why, gentlemen, there are three branches to this Government; but I want to say, in passing, that when the next presidential election comes you will find that no Democratic Congressmen come from Michigan; that we send back 12 Republicans all the time. You will find Michigan standing elbow to elbow with Ohio and Pennsylvania and with any other Republican State for the Republican platform and the Republican candidates. [Applause.] We can fight and kiss and make up. [Laughter.] We are for harmony. I was about to say that there are three branches to this Government, which I learned early; there ought to be anyhow.

Mr. BARTLETT. Used to be.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Used to be in the old Constitution. [Laughter.] Now, we, as one of those branches, make the laws, and we do not make the laws the President of the United States tells us to make. We make the laws that our judgment dictates; the laws that our reason tells us are the proper laws. Then those laws go over to the Supreme Court and that court interprets the law, and after the law is made by us and interpreted by the court the Executive enforces the law. Now, what is his power under the Constitution? and I want to submit it to you. I read from article 2, section 3:

He shall from time to time give to the Congress——

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman think the Constitution is good Republican doctrine?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Certainly; and there is just this difference between you and me about that. We stick to the real Constitution. "The spirit of the law maketh alive," as that same good book says, "but the letter of the law killeth." and it is the letter of the law that you follow. A Democrat was on a boat one time, going across the ocean with his wife, and there was a great storm arose, which swept over the deck. Somehow or other, when they left home they thought it would be convenient to take along the marriage certificate—did not know but some question might be asked. And by and by the storm swept his wife overboard. He was on deck, and they were trying to fish her out, and finally the case seemed to be desperate, and he said, "Mr. Sailor, if you can not save my wife, for God's sake save the marriage certificate." [Laughter.] That is what you say, that you want just the certificate, just the letter of the law, the letter of the Constitution. Now, what does this say?

He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend—recommend for their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

That is all, just recommend—

Now, this is one of the things that he judged to be necessary and one of the things that he judges to be expedient.

Now he has recommended another thing that he thinks is necessary and that he judges to be expedient, the irrigation of the arid lands. I ask whether our leaders here will report out any bill for the irrigation of arid lands? I want to say that that is a proposition which is as near the President's heart as any other that he mentions in his message.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman does not seem to know that that irrigation bill has already been reported.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Oh, well, reporting it does not amount to anything. You will never bring it to a vote. Reporting it is a harmless entertainment.

Mr. PAYNE. It does not belong to our committee.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Certainly not. There will be some way of shutting it out. It does not belong to your committee; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has the right to bring in any kind of a rule which will even make water run up hill and irrigate all the arid lands of the Far West. [Laughter.] But I just want to make a prediction. This is one of these ghosts that my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] speaks about peeking up over the footboard of my bed. That ghost, in my judgment, is that that arid-land proposition of the President will never see the light of day in this Congress, and if it does there will not be five men on this side of the Rocky Mountains who will vote for it. Now, the gentleman is just like the rest of us—just exactly. When he thinks the President is right, then he is with him. When he thinks he is not right, the gentleman is not with him; and that is just exactly my proposition. The President does not represent my district. I wish he did. He could get a nomination up there to-day, even with this beet-sugar agitation. There is no question about that.

And I say, too, that I believe the President of the United States repudiates the use of his name and the use of the argument that he desires the passage of this bill and the use of such statements for the purpose of inducing members of this House to support this measure, and I protest against the use of such means to bolster up this proposition. It shows the weakness of the cause, the weakness of the supporters of this measure, when the great leaders of the party in this House, who have led the party for all these years and shaped the policy of our Government for the eternal good of the race, must now make appeal to the President and ask him by his influence to lobby their bill through; and appeal to the Speaker of the House, to whom members are daily under obligation, and to warn them that they will lose their river and harbor appropriation and their pet measures in which their constituents are interested, as we see stated in the newspapers and not denied.

Appeal to the chairmen of other committees, and even angle across the aisle of this Chamber for support from the Democratic side; and the newspapers state that the Crumpacker resolution for an investigation of the Southern election frauds may sleep the sleep that knows no waking if the Congressmen from the States where the investigation is to take place will only rally to the support of this bill which the Cubans repudiate, which the friends of the measure state will do no good, and which can not result in benefit to the United States. The proposition will not stand alone. It must be bolstered up by influence. It can not go through on its merits.

Ninety per cent of the Republicans in this House, away down in the bottom of their honest hearts, unbiased and uninfluenced by the means and influences I have mentioned, repudiate the measure. They say so openly, shamefaced. The only excuse they make for supporting it is that they must follow the committee; that they do not want to be out of harmony with the leaders; that it is uncomfortable to dwell in a tent where there is a want of harmony.

The same tactics were used to pass the Porto Rican bill in the last Congress. Members of Congress were asked by the leaders to go and see the President. They visited him until President McKinley, noblest of the dead or the living, was driven from his "plain duty," as he saw it, and as he penned it in his message on parchment, in unfading ink, to last forever. And he did it all in the interest of party harmony. And now, not content to appeal to the President, to appeal to the Speaker, to appeal to chairmen of committees to bring in the members of their committee, to appeal to Democrats on the other side, appeal is also made to the memory of the dead President to induce support to the measure. In the name of all that is sacred, what argument is there in all of this?

In the language of Shakespeare—

When went there by a day before when one who spoke of Rome could say,
There dwells within her walls only one man?

It is not a question of House rules; it is a question of ourselves. Under the rules of the House we have the power to prevent the consideration of any measure. It is simply a question of backbone—a question of having as much stability as a piece of boneless liver.

Another proposition, another reason for the support of the bill, another ghost held up, urged by the committee, urged by the witnesses who live in Boston and other large cities, in million-dollar mansions, who own sugar plantations in Cuba, or sugar-refinery stock here, urged by the president of the new republic, who does not live there but who contemplates going down to be inaugurated, and contemplates, if his business interests will permit and he can leave his New Jersey home and business, serving them for one year, is that the United States has some duty to perform and is under some obligation because of the Platt amendment attached to their constitution. I quote that amendment, as follows:

That the government of Cuba shall never enter into any treaty or other compact with any foreign power or powers which will impair or tend to impair the independence of Cuba, nor in any manner authorize or permit any foreign power or powers to obtain by colonization or for military or naval purposes or otherwise lodgment in or control over any portion of said island.

And I submit that there is not one word in that amendment that in any manner hampers Cuba in her commercial relations with any country in this world. It simply provides that she shall not enter into any treaty which will impair her independence or permit any foreign power to obtain control over the island.

Another thing urged is that President McKinley made some kind of a promise, but the proofs before the hearing show that the President told them that he had no power to make such promise.

The proof before the committee showed that there was no suffering in the island of Cuba, but that, on the contrary, Cuba had never experienced such prosperity as she was now enjoying. It is said that the best witness is a confessing litigant. Upon this question I am content to quote from the report made by the committee which favors this bill. On page 2 of that report it is stated:

Since the war, under our administration, she has recuperated in a wonderful degree. During the past three years her great industry, the production of sugar, has multiplied threefold.

Now, I want to submit that if the farmers and the other business men of the United States have increased their business threefold in the past three years, and if the laboring man in this country has during that time improved his condition threefold, then certain it is that we have prospered in this country under protection to the American farmer, protection to the American manufacturer, and protection to American interests "far beyond the dreams of avarice."

Again, on the same page in that report it is stated that—

It is true that labor in Cuba is, and for the past three months has been, fully employed at fair wages; that there has been no famine or distress.

And it appeared in the hearings that common farm laborers received from $23 to $26 per month and board; that there was not a man in Cuba willing to work who could not be employed and at better wages than ever before paid in the history of that land.

The statement of Mr. Machado, sugar planter of Cuba, on page 445 of the hearings, is as follows:

The statement has been made here that all our laborers are employed at good wages and that therefore there can be no misery in Cuba. There lies precisely the reason why Cuba can not make much more sugar than it is making now. We have not population enough to attend to cane growing and manufacturing, the cultivation of other articles like tobacco and vegetables, and the breeding of cattle to a greater extent than these things are done today, and that is why our laborers are all employed at high wages. To grow the present amount of cane some 500,000 acres of land must be cultivated. One man can not attend to more than 3 acres on an average, and there you have already 150,000 men employed. To double our crop we must have 300,000 laborers in the field, working only in cane. Where are these men in a country of about one and a half millions inhabitants all told?

This is a rosy picture, and also shows what I have before said, that if Cuba is to pass such laws as that she then can not develop and add to her population; her progress will be retarded.

And in the report of the committee, on page 4, it is stated that it is impossible for Cuba to increase her production of sugar—unless she was able to import more laborers. For this reason the requirement was placed in the bill that she should adopt immigration and exclusion laws as restrictive as our own laws on these subjects.

Let us briefly review the witnesses who appeared before the committee favoring reciprocity. They are as follows:

E. F. Atkins, Boston, Mass., representing American associated interests of Cuba; C. P. Armstrong, of the New York Produce Exchange; Col. T. H. Bliss, collector of the port of Habana, Cuba; W. R. Corwine, representing the Merchants' Association in New York; R. B. Hawley, representing American and Cuban sugar interests; Howell, Son & Co., sugar commission merchants, New York; Hugh Kelley, New York, sugar merchant; National Sugar Refining Company; Charles Rabadan, New York Produce Exchange; Evan Thomas, ex-president same; F. B. Thurber, president United States Export Association; L. V. De Abad, of Cuba, civil engineer; F. P. Macado, planter; Miguel Mendoza, of Habana, planter; Louis V. Place, sugar commission merchant, and sugar planters of the provinces of Santiago and Puerto Principe, who are represented by Mosle Brothers, of New York, as their agents.

Those against reciprocity take up nearly three pages in the index, and they are all producers—Americans interested in this American product. The iniquity of the whole thing and the evil of it, to my mind, is the false claims and pretenses as to the purpose of the act. Above and beyond all the rest is the rule handed down on the tables of stone, "Thou shalt not bear false witness."

Since this measure can be of no benefit to us, for it is conceded by every man who has spoken in favor of it, by the report of the committee which urges it, by everyone who has looked into the subject, that by reason of the passage of this bill sugar will not be a farthing cheaper to anyone who consumes it; and since it can not be of benefit to Cuba, why should it become a law? Simply and solely to carry out the proposition of the Ways and Means Committee, which is generally conceded to have been a mistake, just simply to permit certain men to have their own way. If there is any other reason, it has not been stated. If there is nc other reason the bill ought not to pass.

The Louisville Courier Journal on March 21 expressed what must be the fair sense of all, wherein it said: "A 20 per cent reduction is insignificant enough, but to limit even that to a period of less than two years is little better than a mockery. It is a contemptible piece of hypocrisy and cowardice."

And a paper in my own district, the Jackson Press, on March 19 puts the proposition about right, as follows: "The 20 per cent cut is insufficient and the immigration suggestion is impudent."

And I want to quote in full an article from the Jackson Citizen, edited by ex-Congressman O'Donnell, who represented that district in this body on the Republican side with honor, ability, and fidelity. The article is so clear that I desire to read it in full, as follows:

THE HYPOCRISY OF RECIPROCITY.

It almost makes one tired to realize the influences and underhand efforts made to mislead the American mind on the subject of reciprocity. A great doctrinal principle, as enunciated, capable of good use if nursed and handled by a wise and prudent statesmanship, it has been perverted and manipulated until as now presented to the people, it is only an appeal to the cupidity on the one hand and a new demonstration and effort to accomplish a revival of free trade on the other. Ever since President McKinley uttered his speech favoring reciprocity as a matter of expediency to extend trade; ever since he asserted that it was "a plain duty" to admit Porto Rico to the unimpeded use of the whole American market, the acclaim of all importers and free traders has been for "reciprocity." Mr. McKinley spoke more as a philanthropist than as a statesman, and his philanthropy has been seized and magnified in the interest of greed and partisanship to the detriment of American prosperity.

The Citizen has, as a newspaper, been favored with dozens of circulars, letters, speeches, statements, and pamphlets favoring reciprocity. Some emanate from the importers of Boston and New York, some from the agricultural implement manufacturers at Chicago, but latterly they mostly come from the offices of the gigantic Havemeyer sugar trust and the great American tobacco combine. Their efforts are now directed to educating public sentiment into a critical stage of interest and sympathy with the downtrodden and suffering people of Cuba. Cut down the Dingley tariff on sugar and tobacco is the outcry, and save the suffering and starving people of Cuba. If you don't do it, loss, destruction, and starvation will follow and the United States will oppress them beyond the limits of Spanish robbery and spoliation. In our view this is naught but self-interest on the one hand and cheap political gush on the other. Cuba is not suffering any more from the operations of tariff and trade to-day than for years agone only in the circulars of interested business men and cheap clap-trap politicians of the free-trade Democratic persuasion, sailing under false colors. The Havemeyers, the Thurbers, the Farquhars are flooding the country with their letters, circulars, and articles, and a part of the newspapers are copying them, as per request, or they are hiring them printed in the patent insides of newspaper publishing houses to influence public opinion. We have lying before us now no less than three of these appeals, with a P. S.—"If you think so, won't you write your Senators and Members of Congress to that effect and also give it continued support in your paper?"

No, gentlemen, we won't. This country has spent nearly a hundred millions and many lives to benefit Cuba. It has freed it from the taxes, extortions, and tyrannies of Spain. Cuba prefers independence to affiliation with the American people. Let her take her choice, and have all the privileges of independent peoples. We must, then, treat her as independent. She has no right to ask for any special privileges, no decreased tariff, no destroying of American industries to build up Cuban interests or to feed the cupidity and greed of American sugar and tobacco trusts. This whole effort to create sympathy for Cuba is only a deep-laid game to enrich capitalists at the expense of American industry and prosperity. Our Government and Congress owe their first duty to protect and benefit our own country and people, and the Senator or Representative who forgets that great and foremost economic fact is a traitor to American prosperity and his own constituency. Government is for justice, home, and domestic prosperity, and not for a simple and gushing sympathy for other people and nations. Politicians may exploit it for partisan advantage, and trusts may struggle for increased profits, but time will uncover the evil and lead to the same repentance the nation experienced in 1894. A reciprocity that benefits the American producers and laborers is the kind that we can all indorse, but a reciprocity that is selfish and promotes only private ends and interests is a perversion of good judgment and wise statesmanship, and will never be approved by the American public.

And in passing, let me inquire as to who has paid for all these newspaper articles and the pamphlets and literature referred to in this article appealing to us for nine months before Congress assembled? Certain it is that in the hearings before the committee and in all the investigations made not one utterance has been traced to any Cuban planter, not one word has been heard from any Cuban who anticipates getting any benefit from this law. On the other hand, many of the publications and utterances and arguments have been traced to and the money to pay therefor has been shown to come from the coffers of the sugar trust, which my friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] intimated had caused me to see ghosts behind each fluttering leaf. I am quite ready to admit that I join the President in what he said in his speech at Charleston, which my friend from Ohio so warmly commended in his warning against the immense forces of capital now massed, and in his statement that the national welfare requires that the power of supervision and regulation over them ought to be exercised by this Government. If I might indulge the hope that some day I could become more familiar with the "strong box" of Mr. Havemeyer I might learn to look upon it with less fear and trembling.

I have no objection to people acquiring wealth, and in the language of an eloquent friend of mine in Michigan, I am still willing that there should be another millionaire in the world, and I am a candidate for the place. At the same time, it is humiliating that a great trust should control 90 per cent of the sugar we must all use—absolutely control the price and the market. One of the representatives of the Bay City Company showed that when an old farmer came with his wagon to get some sugar for a country merchant at their place he had to wait until they could call up Mr. Havemeyer's agent in Chicago on the long-distance telephone to find out what they would be permitted to sell sugar in Michigan that morning. It was then 10 o'clock, and the Bay City man was told that Mr. Havemeyer had not yet had his breakfast, and did not get down to the office until 11 o'clock. So the farmer had to hitch his horses and wait until the coffee of the sugar-trust magnate cooled and he had reached his office at 11 o'clock.

There is no doubt but what this same committee a year ago understood that if the tariff was reduced on sugar the trust would get the benefit, for in report No. 1766 upon a resolution to put Porto Rican and Cuban sugar on the free list that committee stated that it would be a gift of the amount of $1,200,000 to the sugar trust.

But whether the trust will get this or not, and we ought not to pass a law which would leave any doubt upon the subject, the Agricultural Department has spent a lot of money to develop the sugar-beet interest; it is a protection from which the farmer derives a direct benefit. Michigan to-day makes 80 per cent of all the sugar she uses; in the course of a few years the United States can produce from the beet all the sugar she can consume.

We sent away $444,000 of agricultural products last year, sent away to foreign markets and brought back to this country money from foreign lands therefor. This picture is marred some by the fact that we brought into this country during the same time $222,000,000 of farm products, over $100,000,000 of which we paid for sugar, which we sent away to other countries never to come back. I believe it is the duty of Congress to stimulate this business, to keep this money at home.

The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR, intimated that platforms were not very sacred, that they were made in a night; and the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MCCALL, said that they were an expedient—or that, in effect, was his argument—like a car platform, to get in on. I can not believe that this is the opinion of people generally, and I know that such are not the sentiments of the Republicans of Michigan.

When Mr. McKinley was elected President in the fall of 1896 business took a new life, and where a want of confidence and distrust existed business stability and forward march came, all on the faith and confidence the country had in Republican promises and Republican principles. And I know that $10,000,000 has been invested in the sugar-beet business in Michigan, farms have been made more valuable, mortgages paid off, towns, villages, and cities have prospered. And I believe that this money was invested on the faith of the pledges and the principles of the Republican party. And I believe that we are in honor bound to stand by those pledges, hurt Havemeyer, help Cuba, or come what may. Fair play is a jewel. Right is mighty and will prevail.

Truth crushed to earth shall rise again;
The eternal years of God are hers;
But Error, wounded, writhes in pain,
And dies amid her worshippers.

[Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. LACEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12765) to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. THAYER, for ten days, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE, and in accordance with the order heretofore made, the House (at 5 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 17, 1902, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for Columbia Hospital—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a memorial from the Cherokee Indians, together with a draft of a bill for the allotment of lands—to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for military prison at Alcatraz, Cal.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Grant Statue or Memorial Commission, reporting progress and recommending an appropriation—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending an appropriation for protection of Orient Point (New York) light station—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HULL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13113) to authorize the Secretary of War to loan tents for the use of the Spanish War Veterans' encampment at Indianapolis, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1641); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ADAMSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 12867) to authorize the Shreveport Bridge and Terminal Company to construct and maintain a bridge across Red River, in the State of Louisiana, at or near Shreveport, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1642); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HULL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9503) to authorize the Oklahoma and Western Railroad Company to construct and operate a railway through the Fort Sill Military Reservation, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1643); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3153) to amend section 698 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1644); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 4355) authorizing the issuance of a patent to the county of Clallam, State of Washington, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1645); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13278) granting an increase of pension to Levi H. Collins, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1621); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. LINDSAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13296) granting an increase of pension to Francis Scott, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1622); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CALDERHEAD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4509) granting an increase of pension to Eliza Knight, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1623); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5159) granting a pension to W. A. Miller, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1624); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CALDERHEAD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 2305) granting an increase of pension to Lemuel Grove, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1625); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. APLIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6718) granting an increase of pension to Andrew R. Jones, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1626); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. KLEBERG, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5865) granting an increase of pension to Col. James C. Campbell, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1627); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CROWLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7618) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Sheridan, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1628); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. BERRY. I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to the report I am about to submit. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5062) to authorize the county commissioners of Crow Wing County, in the State of Minnesota, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at a point between Pine River and Dean Brook, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, to report it with amendments.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to add at the end of the bill the following as an additional section:

SEC. 2. That said bridge shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, and shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States; and no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroad or railroads leading to said bridge. Equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph companies, and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal-telegraph purposes, and all changes in said bridge required by the Secretary of War at any time, or its entire removal, shall be at the expense of the corporation owning or operating said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following as an additional section:

SEC. 3. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within two years and completed within four years from the date of approval thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following as an additional section:

SEC. 4. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES H. WALKER.

Mr. CARMACK. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4868) granting an increase of pension to James J. Walker, to report it with amendments, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Pensions were, in line 6, to change the middle initial "J" to "H," and, in line 7, to strike out "Volunteers" and insert "Voltigeurs;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James H. Walker, late captain Company D, United States Voltigeurs, war with Mexico, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to James H. Walker."

MOBILE, JACKSON AND KANSAS CITY RAILROAD.

Mr. TURNER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12452) granting to the Mobile, Jackson and Kansas City Railroad Company the right to use for railroad purposes the tract of land at Choctaw Point, Mobile County, Ala., and now held for light-house purposes, to report it without amendment, with the request for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TURNER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4475) granting to the Mobile, Jackson and Kansas City Railroad Company the right to use for railroad purposes the tract of land at Choctaw Point, Mobile County, Ala., and now held for light-house purposes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

MILITARY RESERVATION AT BATON ROUGE, LA.

Mr. PETTUS. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11636) providing for the transfer of the title to the military reservation at Baton Rouge, La., to the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College, to report it without amendment, and I ask that it be considered now

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATE ELECTION CASES.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections is hereby authorized to have compiled for the use of the Senate a new edition of the work on Senate Election Cases, bringing the same down to the present Congress.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MILLARD introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5276) granting an increase of pension to Otis Long;

A bill (S. 5277) granting an increase of pension to Robert Buckner; and

A bill (S. 5278) granting an increase of pension to J. Francis Hopper.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 5279) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to restore to public entry lands embraced in whole or in part within segregations for reservoirs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5280) granting a pension to Dollie Cosens; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CARMACK introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 5281) for the relief of the heirs of John T. Lawrence, deceased;

A bill (S. 5282) for the relief of the estate of Benjamin D. Gates, deceased; and

A bill (S. 5283) for the relief of the estate of William H. Neel, deceased.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 5284) for the relief of Aaron A. Marrs;

A bill (S. 5285) for the relief of the heirs of Mrs. D. J. Booth, deceased; and

A bill (S. 5286) for the relief of the heirs of Peyton V. Duke.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas introduced a bill (S. 5287) granting an increase of pension to William J. Murray; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 5288) to limit the cost of the public building at Joplin, Mo.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PRITCHARD introduced a bill (S. 5289) to revise the laws of the United States relating to trade-marks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5290) to regulate and protect marks, trade-marks, commercial names, and symbols used in commerce, and to enforce treaties regarding the same; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5291) granting a pension to John Roberts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5292) granting a pension to Sonnie Washington; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 5293) for the relief of the estate of Wiley Holt, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 5294) granting an increase of pension to William F. Horn; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 5295) to promote Henry B. Carrington to the rank of brigadier-general; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MCMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 5296) granting an increase of pension to Michael Sheehy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5297) to provide for the erection of a bridge across the Detroit River at Detroit, in the State of Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5298) for the relief of the widow of Lemuel J. Draper, late assistant surgeon, United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5299) to amend sections 897 and 903 of subchapter 7 of chapter 19 of an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5300) to provide for the abatement of nuisances in the District of Columbia by the Commissioners of said District, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (S. 5301) to authorize the erection of a monument at Point Pleasant, W. Va., to commemorate the battle of the Revolution fought at that point between the colonial troops and Indians October 10, 1774; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5302) granting an increase of pension to John H. Everitt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5303) for the relief of the North American Transportation and Trading Company; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DEPEW introduced a bill (S. 5304) for the relief of Eliza Ellen Ehle; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5305) to place Lieut. Col. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Alexander Stewart Webb on the retired list of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WETMORE introduced a bill (S. 5306) authorizing the joining of Kalorama avenue; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 5307) granting an increase of pension to Oren Rollins; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5308) granting an increase of pension to Hosea A. Dunham; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas introduced a bill (S. 5309) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Batesville, in the State of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

FRANKS FOR SENDING OUT SEEDS.

Mr. TILLMAN. I introduce a joint resolution for which I ask immediate consideration. I will state that I have conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and he did not think it was necessary to refer it to that committee. It is largely self-explanatory.

The joint resolution (S. R. 82) providing for the printing annually of franks required for sending out seed was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Public Printer shall furnish to the Secretary of Agriculture, on his order, such franks as the Secretary of Agriculture may require for sending out seeds on Congressional orders and for sending out seeds on order of the Secretary of Agriculture, such franks to bear the names of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates printed thereon and the words "United States Department of Agriculture, Congressional seed distribution," or such other phraseology as the Secretary may direct, and that such franks shall be furnished each year at such times and in such quantities as the Secretary of Agriculture may require.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HOAR submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 to enable the Commissioner of Labor to collect and report to Congress statistics of and relating to marriage and divorce in the several States and Territories and in the District of Columbia since January 1, 1887, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MCMILLAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,500 to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to appoint 11 medical inspectors of public schools at $500 each, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MCCOMAS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,955.70 to reimburse the city of Annapolis, Md., for amount expended by said city in paving College avenue, in said city, with vitrified brick, and North West street, in said city, with granite blocks, in front of the United States post-office property, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for the reconstruction, in part, of the present Providence Hospital building and finishing of nurses' home, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment proposing to create the office of commissioner of Pacific Railroads and to provide for the salaries of one commissioner and clerks in the same, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF JOHN T. LAWRENCE.

Mr. CARMACK submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Claims:

Resolved by the Senate, That the heirs of John T. Lawrence, deceased, be, and are hereby, authorized and empowered to present to the Court of Claims for adjudication their claims for the property lost, destroyed, or taken and used by the United States forces during the late rebellion, and all statutes of limitation are hereby waived. Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Court of Claims to hear and determine said claim on its merits and for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, generally known as the Tucker Act. And in considering the claim any testimony taken by the agent of the Quartermaster-General and the affidavits of witnesses and the sworn declarations filed with the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General shall be considered by the court competent evidence.

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and it is hereby, authorized to take testimony and to summon and examine witnesses in the investigation of the conduct and management of Indian schools and reservations now being made by said committee; and that the expenses of the same be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

EXPENSES OF NAVAL OPERATIONS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CULBERSON was read, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a statement of the amount of money expended, and the amount, so far as he is able to state the same, for which the Government of the United States is liable, remaining unpaid, for equipment, transportation, supplies, and naval operations in the Philippine Islands each year from May 1, 1898, to the present time.

EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS, ETC., IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution, which will be read.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CULBERSON was read, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate the following:

1. A statement of the amount of money paid by the United States for or on account of the Philippine Commission to the date when such expenses were paid out of the Philippine treasury.

2. A statement of the amount of money paid by the United States for or on account of railway transportation for troops to and from the Philippine Islands since the ratification of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain, and the several railway companies to which it was paid and the sums paid each of them.

3. A statement of the amount of money expended and the amount, as far as he is able to state the same, for which the Government of the United States is liable, remaining unpaid, for equipment, supplies, and military operations in the Philippine Islands each year from May 1, 1898, to the present time.

SAMUEL J. LAMBDEN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4072) granting an increase of pension to Samuel J. Lambden; which was, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "sixteen."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate agree to the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY JANE FAULKNER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1512) granting an increase of pension to Mary Jane Faulkner; which was, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty" and insert "sixteen."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate agree to the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

LOUISE WARD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2082) granting an increase of pension to Louise Ward; which was, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty-five."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate agree to the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

TAX ON TOBACCO.

Mr. MCENERY. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 3896) to amend section 3362 of the Revised Statutes relating to tobacco. It is a short bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, to strike out the first three lines, in the following words:

That the last paragraph, being paragraph 6 of section 3362 of the Revised Statutes, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That section 3362 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 1, 1879, and by the act of January 9, 1883, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all after the fifth paragraph thereof and inserting in lieu of the words so stricken out the following.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3362 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 1, 1879, and by the act of January 9, 1883, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all after the fifth paragraph thereof and inserting in lieu of the words so stricken out the following:

"And every such wooden package shall have printed or marked thereon the manufacturer's name and place of manufacture, the registered number of the manufactory, and the gross weight, the tare, and the net weight of the tobacco in each package: Provided, That these limitations and descriptions of packages shall not apply to tobacco and snuff transported in bond for exportation and actually exported: And provided further, That perique tobacco, fine-cut shorts, the refuse of fine-cut chewing tobacco, refuse scraps, clippings, cuttings, and sweepings of tobacco may be sold in bulk as material, and without the payment of tax, by one manufacturer directly to another manufacturer, or for export, under such restrictions, rules, and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe: And provided further, That wood, metal, paper, or other materials may be used separately or in combination for packing tobacco, snuff, and cigars under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may establish."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNION RAILROAD STATION.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask that the report which I send to the desk may be reprinted, with the amendments which have been made to it and testimony added, a few copies of which were printed for the use of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and it is important that it should be printed as now presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

There being no objection, the order was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That Senate Report No. 982, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, relating to the union railroad station at Washington, D. C., be reprinted, with amendments and additions.

LOUISIANA PURCHASE EXPOSITION COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Industrial Expositions, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State covering a statement showing the receipts and disbursements of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company for the month of March, 1902, furnished by the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Commission, in pursuance of section 11 of the "Act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of the Louisiana Territory," etc., approved March 3, 1901.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, April 17, 1902.

NICARAGUA CANAL.

Mr. MORGAN. If there is no further business before the Senate, I should like to call attention to the notice I gave yesterday that I would request the indulgence of the Senate this morning to make some observations on the subject of the Nicaragua Canal. I ask that the bill be called up simply for that purpose. I do not propose to ask for its consideration this morning out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, there is but one class of enterprises projected in the United States that is free from the control of private interests and is intended only to promote the general welfare. It is the class of enterprises that, in some form, increase and facilitate ocean navigation. Such works are Government property and are guarded by every form of legal, judicial, and executive power against the intrusion of private interests.

All rivers, harbors, bays, and canals that aid the commerce of the country are free from private ownership and are open to the use of the people, upon equal terms.

This policy can not be reversed as to a ship canal to be constructed and owned by the United States to connect the great oceans without a breach of public faith.

Assuming that Congress is ready to undertake such a work in this spirit of sincere devotion to the welfare of the people and to realize the anxious hopes of all, except those who would profit by further delays, I will address myself on this occasion to the question of the choice of routes for an isthmian canal. It is a question of the greatest moment, and should be considered carefully, dispassionately, and with impartial sincerity.

A mistake made in the selection of a canal route which will or may involve the failure of the effort to construct a safe canal will be fatal.

A route that is safe for the construction and maintenance of a ship canal is the supreme consideration that should control the selection now to be made by Congress. The interest at stake and the expenditures involved are too great to justify the abandonment of a safe route for the sake of the possible saving of money in a less costly route that is of doubtful safety.

I wish to present the facts that bear directly upon this subject, not in full detail, but in just outline, for the consideration of the Senate, and will make quotations from the proofs, rather than statements of their substance, in what I now have to say on this subject.

In bringing the subject of an isthmian canal to the attention of the Senate in advance of the consideration of the subject by the vote of this body it is not my intention to discuss the merits of the measure passed by the House of Representatives and reported, without amendment, by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, as a national or commercial question.

I will assume that the Senate, without material division of opinion, is convinced that a canal is an indispensable, national necessity, and that the people, with almost complete accord, are demanding it for that reason and for the additional reason that it will remove the obstructions to industry and commerce that have so long chained the right arm of their strength in almost helpless paralysis.

I also assume that the honest enthusiasm that moved the House of Representatives as one man to vote a second time for the Hepburn bill was not merely the result of thoughtless rejoicing that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had been put aside and that the way was at last open to success, but that it was the result of long and mature study of the whole situation, and of a noble and patriotic impulse to accomplish a work that no other people could perform, for the benefit of the world. Blind zeal has never led in such toilsome work, where the dredge, the pick, and the shovel are the instruments of winning national honors, instead of the battle ship, the sword, and the rifle.

It is only a choice of methods and a comparison of national advantages that we are left to decide; all questions of financial ability, of private interests and preferences, of political bias, and other influences and antagonism having been relegated to the rear by the command of a free, honest, and powerful people.

The honor and the high duty of making this choice now belongs to Congress. In its performance, on my part, I will not permit any doubtful fact to sway my judgment, nor will I shrink from presenting the whole truth, as I believe it, under the pressure of any influence or the bias of preconceived opinions. It is to reach the logical results that should follow the actual merits of the claim of either canal route, in deciding the preference, that I will try to present an outline of the questions that now require discussion.

In this endeavor I will not attempt to discuss exhaustively any point I may state, but I will present some of the leading points which control my judgment, leaving their more complete presentation to others who have studied them with greater care and will discuss them with greater ability than I could bring to their consideration.

CERTAINTY OF SUCCESS IS THE TRUE FOUNDATION.

The subject presents itself to my mind with conclusive force in the form stated in the six propositions I will now state:

1. We have reached the point where investigation is complete by observation, experience, scientific research and forecast, and these means of knowledge are as conclusive of the facts as we could hope to make them in another half century of delay.

This knowledge of the controlling facts, as to the practicability of a canal through the American Isthmus, satisfies the people of the United States that the time for final action has come.

2. The question now to be decided is the choice of either of two routes for a canal; whether it shall be located at Panama, or through the valley of the San Juan River, in Nicaragua and Costa Rica.

3. The controlling factor in making this selection is the assurance of success in constructing a canal that will be permanently useful for commerce, and for the needs of the Government and its policies, and for the benefit of the people of the United States.

4. A sum of money necessary for expenditure in the work of constructing such a canal, to accomplish such ends, can not be reasonably compared with the real value of the results to the people and the Government of the United States, and the choice of either route, with safe, intelligent, and sincere regard to its permanent usefulness and advantage, should not be controlled or affected by a difference in the present cost of construction.

An assumed or supposititious difference in the cost of construction of either canal that does not exceed $6,000,000 is not a real factor in the choice of either route, if the route that it is cheapest to build is not the route that will give to the people and Government of the United States the most certain assurance of success in constructing a canal that will be permanent and the most useful for the industrial and commercial needs of the people and the most necessary for the Government in its domestic and foreign relations and its military and civil policies.

Yet, I will discuss the question of the estimated cost of the two canals, to remove, if I can, the impression that there is a real margin of expenditure in favor of the Panama route, the cost of which is estimated at $184,233,358, if we should purchase that canal and the railroad alongside it, for $40,000,000.

I will recur to this matter later on.

5. The assured certainty of success in the construction of a permanent canal is, of necessity, the basic or foundation fact upon which Congress must act in the selection of the canal route.

Considered as a simple proposition of civil engineering, there is no doubt—not even a shadow of doubt—as to any fact touching the practicability of a ship canal from Grey Town to Brito, in and along the San Juan River and across Lake Nicaragua.

It is certain, beyond a reasonable doubt, that its cost is as nearly within the limits of exact estimates as any great public work that was ever undertaken.

As to this fact, there is no difference of opinion among the great number of engineers who have surveyed the Nicaragua route, or the boards and commissions that have studied and reported upon it, or the contractors who have examined and counted its cost in every element of calculation with a view to making contracts for its construction, or among the great engineers sent out by European countries to ascertain the feasibility of a proposed great highway of the world.

It is upon this ascertained and settled basis of certainty that I rest my judgment. I have been compelled to accept the conclusion that the Nicaragua route is the true and safe route to be adopted by Congress, and when I contrast it with the many and dangerous uncertainties of the Panama route, my judgment will not permit me to cast aside this assured success and this conclusive state of facts and, for the possible saving of $5,630,704 in the estimated cost of constructing the canal, to imitate the dog in the fable, in dropping the bone from his mouth to seize its reflected image in the water he was crossing. Æsop's homely fable illustrates a danger that now threatens this august Senate.

6. If the dam at Bohio, on the Panama route, should fail for any cause, the only hope of a canal across that isthmus would perish, never to be restored. All engineers admit this fact.

The failure of a dam at Conchuda, or Boca San Carlos or at Ochoa, or at Tambogrande, or at any other site on the San Juan River, would only mean the loss of that structure, to be replaced on a better location if a lake-level canal is preferred.

A dam at Bohio is the only possible location for such a structure across the Chagres River; while there are many sites for dams across the San Juan River that will raise the water to the level of Lake Nicaragua and give 126.24 miles of lake-level navigation for all classes of vessels. Or if lake-level navigation in the San Juan River should be found impracticable, the resort to slack-water navigation, with low-level dams at its rapids, would substitute the present plan with one scarcely less desirable.

A SINGLE CHANCE OF SUCCESS IS TOO GREAT A RISK.

At Bohio there is but a solitary chance to employ the Chagres River for canal purposes, and that is shaken with many serious doubts in the minds of the same engineers who assert that no doubts impend over the San Juan route; and on this route there is an assured certainty of using the waters of Lake Nicaragua at many places for the construction of a dam for a permanent canal at the level of the lake.

These chances are at least ten to one, and if the risk is estimated only at tenfold the cost of the dam at Bohio it would deter the boldest gambler in futures from risking the possible loss of more than $80,000,000 when, if he was successful, his profits could not exceed $6,000,000.

But the loss of a dam at Bohio could not be less than $144,233,358 clear loss to the United States in cash, to say nothing of the lives wasted in the work, the incalculable loss to our commerce, and the national shame and despair that our people would suffer.

We are asked to stake too much upon the dam at Bohio, while we will, in all likelihood, if we choose that route, yield to others, either speculative Americans or jealous competitors for trade, the opportunity to seize upon the advantages which we have demonstrated to be certain on the Nicaragua route. That there may be no rational doubt that the United States has made this demonstration, at the cost of near $2,000,000, I will present the following facts, which are undisputed:

THE CERTAINTY OF SUCCESS DEMONSTRATED AT NICARAGUA, ACCORDING TO THE UNDISPUTED FACTS.

The Nicaragua Canal Commission, consisting of Rear-Admiral John G. Walker, president; Col. Peter C. Hains, Corps of Engineers, and Prof. Lewis M. Haupt, civil engineer, a graduate of West Point, was appointed in 1897. The Secretary of State issued final instructions to this Commission on November 3, 1897, closing as follows:

In other words, your report should be as full and conclusive upon the subject as it is practicable to make it, to the end that "the proper route, the feasibility and cost of construction of the Nicaragua Canal," may, if possible, be absolutely fixed and determined.

The Commission and its assistants, about 100 men, entered the field of work at Grey Town December 5, 1897, and completed their examinations March 26 following, a period of nearly four months, leaving parties in the field at work acquiring additional data. Their report was completed May 9, 1899, and sent to the President. They were commissioned August 2, 1897, and were closely engaged in this work until May 9, 1899—a period of one year and nine months. Their report has not been equaled by any subsequent report as to carefulness of statement, the breadth of inquiry, the precision of its measurements and estimates, and the clear and frank conclusions at which it arrived.

They say in their report that they spent five days in Panama "in examining the Panama Canal line, the work being done, and the plans, drawings, and data in the office of the company at Panama."

The dimensions of the canal in Nicaragua, surveyed and located by this Commission, are as follows: In earth, 150 feet at bottom. In the river, 300 feet at bottom. The canal nowhere to be less than 30 feet deep. The entire cost, with 20 per cent added for contingencies, was estimated by Commissioners Walker and Haupt at $118,133,790, and by Commissioner Hains at $134,818,308.

In order to get this important report fairly before the Senate and the country, I present the following extracts from the text on pages 42, 43, under the head of "Feasibility," and from pages 45, 46, under the head of "Conclusions:"

FEASIBILITY.

Under this division of the subject the Commission would respectfully submit that it has failed to find any competent authority that denies the feasibility of constructing a canal across Nicaragua.

The feasibility of the canal is conceded for the following reasons:

1. There are at this date sufficient precedents for ship canals capable of passing the largest vessels, so that any question of the navigation of such a channel is eliminated.

2. The ability to construct and operate locks of the requisite dimensions is sufficiently established by existing structures on the Manchester and Keil canals, at Davis Island on the Ohio, and at the St. Marys Canal, Michigan.

3. The possibility of constructing the necessary dams, weirs, sluices, and embankments which shall be sufficiently stable and impermeable to control the water required for navigation, as well as to regulate the floods, is within the resources of the engineering profession and is fully demonstrated by many hundreds of miles of embankments, levees, and dams both at home and abroad. There is no reason to doubt the ability to build them out of native rocks and earth and to give them the required strength and tightness to retain or to discharge the water with safety.

4. There is no question as to the adequacy of the supply of water for all purposes at all seasons, nor as to its control in times of floods.

5. Neither is there any doubt with reference to the ability to secure good supporting ground for the trunk of the canal nor suitable sites for locks and dams.

6. The harbor question is only a matter of money, and it is believed that good, capacious, and safe artificial harbors can be created at a reasonable cost. In brief, the Commission sees no reason to doubt the entire feasibility of the project, but it realizes the necessity of exercising due care in the preparation for the specifications and in the conduct of the work, and that the details of construction be thoroughly inspected and properly executed under competent supervision.

CONCLUSIONS.

The Commission after mature deliberation has adopted and estimated for the route from Brito to Lake Nicaragua, called the Childs route, varient No. 1, and from the lake to Grey Town, that is called the Lull route, varient No. 1. This line leaving Brito follows the left bank of the Rio Grande to near Buen Retiro, crosses the western divide to the valley of the Lajas, which it follows to Lake Nicaragua. Crossing the lake to the head of the San Juan River, it follows the upper river to near Boca San Carlos, thence, in excavation, by the left bank of the river to the San Juanillo, and across the low country to Grey Town, passing to the northward of Lake Silico. It requires but a single dam, with regulating works at both ends of the summit level.

The new location selected for the dam at Boca San Carlos eliminates one of the most serious engineering difficulties by avoiding entirely the San Carlos River, with its torrential floods and large volume of sediment, and by locking down immediately from this dam the difficulties and risks of the high embankments of the Menocal line are also avoided.

Instead of the dam at La Flor a lock and regulating works have been substituted at Buen Retiro, where the topography is well adapted for the purpose. It is also proposed to divide the surplus waters of the lake basin between the east and west sides, thus reducing the velocities in the San Juan and securing ample waste-way capacity for the maximum discharge that can ever occur, if stored and distributed over a short period of time. Ample provision has also been made for a possible fluctuation of the lake of 6 feet or more without injury to property by fixing the elevation of the bottom of the canal sufficiently low to cover seasons of minimum rainfall. The surveys have in general revealed better physical conditions than were heretofore supposed to exist, especially as to the amount of rock in the upper river, whereby it is possible greatly to reduce the estimated cost of construction. This fact will account largely for the comparatively moderate amount of the estimate when the enlarged dimensions of the project are taken into consideration. Other reductions are due to the improved methods and machinery available, as developed on the Chicago Drainage Canal, and which can not be ignored in discussing a work of this magnitude.

The creation of sufficiently capacious interior harbors presents no unusual difficulties, and they can be secured at a reasonable cost.

The field work, under the authority of this Commission, has been carefully and well done, and is believed to be all that is necessary for the preliminary location of a canal, and to determine, within narrow limits, the final location of dams, locks, and other constructions. Should a canal across Nicaragua be authorized it will be necessary to make further minute and careful investigations by borings to determine the exact location of locks and dams, for which the Commission has neither the time nor money, nor would it have been justified in doing work of this character until the construction of a canal was assured. The computations of amounts to be excavated have been carefully made and checked to guard against errors and are believed to be accurate within narrow limits. All possible information has been sought with regard to cost of similar work in the United States and in Central America, and a careful comparison made of the probable differences between Nicaragua and the United States.

To determine the proper unit prices for excavation the average of prices actually paid to contractors on the Chicago drainage canal, which represent cost of plant, prices paid for work done, and contractors' profits, were taken. Up to this point the Commission dealt only with facts. To the prices paid at Chicago certain percentages have been added for the difference in location, climate, etc. These percentages are, of course, a matter of judgment, upon which men may honestly differ. But from all the information obtainable by this Commission and after careful consideration, with a desire to arrive at a proper conclusion, those used in the estimate are deemed fair and reasonable.

In obtaining the estimate for cost of locks the prices actually paid for building the Government locks at the Sault Ste. Marie were taken, and 33 per cent was added for the difference of location. This percentage is believed to be ample, as a large part of the expense of constructing the locks will be for material, much of which can be furnished in Nicaragua at the same or only a small advance upon the prices in the United States.

After giving due weight to all the elements of this important question, and with an earnest desire to reach logical conclusions, based upon substantial facts, the Commission believes that a canal can be built across the Isthmus on this route for a sum not exceeding that stated in the estimate.

The dimensions of the canal proposed are much larger than any heretofore considered, and will be ample not only to meet the present requirements of commerce, but also for many years to come. A navigable channel of smaller dimensions than those proposed, only sufficient for present needs, can be constructed for a lesser sum, if deemed expedient.

The more reliable character of the work done in Nicaragua by this Commission than that done at Bohio, in Panama, by the Isthmian Canal Commission, is shown by the fact that the diamond drill was not used at Bohio, while it was used in all the borings made by the Nicaraguan Canal Commission.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS MADE BY THESE COMMISSIONS IN 1901.

These three commissioners were also members of the subsequent Isthmian Canal Commission, which was appointed on the 10th of June, 1899.

They made statements before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals on the 11th of May, 1900, touching their former report, in which Admiral Walker stated, in response to questions, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Did you find any reason to depart from the report of the former Commission on the following subjects? I will state them seriatim:

Under the head of "Feasibility," you say in the former report:

"Under this division of the subject the Commission would respectfully submit that it has failed to find any competent authority that denies the feasibility of constructing a canal across Nicaragua."

Have you, since that time, or did your Commission find any authority that denied the feasibility of the canal?

Admiral WALKER. As far as I know the opinions of the members of this Commission, they have no doubt that it is feasible to build a canal across Nicaragua.

The CHAIRMAN. You say:

"1. There are at this date sufficient precedents for ship canals capable of passing the largest vessels, so that any question of the navigation of such a channel is eliminated."

Are you still of that opinion?

Admiral WALKER. I am still of that opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. You say:

"2. The ability to construct and operate locks of the requisite dimensions is sufficiently established by existing structures on the Manchester and Kiel canals, at Davis Island, on the Ohio, and at the St. Mary Canal, Michigan."

I suppose you might add to that the drainage canal of Chicago?

Admiral WALKER. There are no locks on the drainage canal.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you still adhere to that opinion?

Admiral WALKER. Yes, sir; I am still of the same opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. You say:

3. "The possibility of constructing the necessary dams, weirs, sluices, and embankments which shall be sufficiently stable and impermeable to control the water required for navigation, as well as to regulate the floods, is within the resources of the engineering profession and is fully demonstrated by many hundreds of miles of embankments, levees, and dams, both at home and abroad. There is no reason to doubt the ability to build them out of the native rocks and earth and to give them the required strength and tightness to retain or to discharge the water with safety."

Do you still adhere to that opinion?
Admiral WALKER. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. You say again:
4. "There is no question as to the adequacy of the supply of water for all purposes at all seasons, nor as to its control in time of flood."
Do you still adhere to that opinion?
Admiral WALKER. I am still of that opinion.
The CHAIRMAN. That is the principal factor in the canal business, is it not?
Admiral WALKER. Those are pretty large factors; yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. You say further:
5. "Neither is there any doubt with reference to the ability to secure good supporting ground for the trunk of the canal nor suitable sites for locks and dams."
Do you still adhere to that view?
Admiral WALKER. I think that they can be found; yes.
The CHAIRMAN. You say:
6. "The harbor question is only a matter of money and it is believed that good, capacious, and safe artificial harbors can be created at a reasonable cost. In brief, this Commission sees no reason to doubt the entire feasibility of the project, but it realizes the necessity of due care in the preparation of the specifications and in the conduct of the work, and that the details of construction be properly executed under competent supervision. Do you adhere to that?"
Admiral WALKER. Yes, sir.

On that examination General Hains stated as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. General Hains, you were a member of the former Ludlow commission, were you not?
Colonel HAINS. No, sir; of the Walker Commission.
The CHAIRMAN. And you joined in the report, making a qualification of your estimate of the cost?
Colonel HAINS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. You placed it above that of the other two associate commissioners?
Colonel HAINS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. You went out and made an examination of the Nicaragua Canal again, did you, with the board?
Colonel HAINS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Have you any change to make showing a change of opinion on your part as to the feasibility and practicability of the Nicaragua route?
Colonel HAINS. No, sir.

Professor Haupt made the following statements:

Professor HAUPT. I did not accompany the Commission to Nicaragua or Panama.
The CHAIRMAN. So that your personal knowledge on the subject is such as you derived when you went there with the former Walker Commission?
Professor HAUPT. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Have you made a study of this subject since you were out on that Commission—a close study of it?
Professor HAUPT. I have, sir, as far as the data were available.
The CHAIRMAN. Have you looked over the reports of the Walker Commission recently?
Professor HAUPT. No, sir; I have not revised them since publication.
The CHAIRMAN. From what you have heard the other engineer say here to-day, and from what you know of your personal examinations of the Nicaragua route, have you changed your opinions as expressed in that report?
Professor HAUPT. I have not, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. You see no reason for changing your opinion?
Professor HAUPT. No, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever examined the Panama route?
Professor HAUPT. Yes, sir. The Walker Commission went over the route carefully and made a reconnoissance during the first Commission.
The CHAIRMAN. What length of time did you spend there?
Professor HAUPT. We spent there about a week, and had every facility that could be offered us by the railroad company, as well as the canal company, for the purpose.
The CHAIRMAN. In what year was that?
Professor HAUPT. That was in the year 1898, in the winter.
The CHAIRMAN. While the new company were at work?
Professor HAUPT. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Did you see forces at work while you were there?
Professor HAUPT. They had about 3,000 men at work, it was claimed.
The CHAIRMAN. What part of the Panama Canal did you examine while you were out there?
Professor HAUPT. The entire route of the line of the canal, extending from Panama to Colon.

THESE STATEMENTS AGAIN CONFIRMED IN 1900 AND 1901.

On the 30th of November, 1900, the Isthmian Canal Commission, in their preliminary report to the President, recommended the Nicaragua route as "the most practicable and feasible route for a canal to be under the control, management, and ownership of the United States."

A year later, in their final report to the President, the Isthmian Canal Commission again recommended the Nicaragua route as the most practicable and feasible.

This should establish the leading and foundation fact on which the action of Congress may safely rest, that in Nicaragua there is a route that is assuredly feasible and practicable; and that if one plan of construction or one line of location of the canal should fail another location will be readily found to substitute it, or other dams can be built to supply the loss.

In the loss of a dam at Bohio the canal is lost; but if the dam at Conchuda is lost, the canal is only delayed.

On page 161 of their report the Isthmian Canal Commission say that—

A dam across the San Juan River at Machuca Rapids could be built more quickly and would cost much less than at Conchuda or any other point below Machuca; but a canal in the San Juan Valley, between Conchuda and Machuca, would be very expensive on account of the hilly character of the country.

These places are about 10 miles apart.

As to the one vital point in the Panama Canal, the dam at Bohio, and as to the dam at Conchuda, on the Nicaragua route—that being one of several dam sites on the San Juan River that are entirely practicable—Admiral Walker, in his examination under oath by the committee, made the following statements:

Senator HARRIS. The fact is with regard to the Bohio Dam that the future of that is just as much an unknown quantity as the future of the dam at Conchuda?
Admiral WALKER. I should say it was more of an uncertain feature. It is a great work and a more difficult work to build. The Conchuda Dam I look upon as practically settled.
Senator HARRIS. So that we know no more about the possibilities and contingencies at Bohio than we do at Conchuda—in fact, less?
Admiral WALKER. We know less about the contingencies at Bohio, but that is the only point in the whole line about which we are at all uncertain.
Senator HARRIS. But that is the vital point?
Admiral WALKER. That is the vital point. Yes; it is vital to the canal, because the safety of the canal depends on the integrity of the dam in both cases.
Senator HARRIS. And the control of the river?
Admiral WALKER. Yes.

And on page 462 he stated as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember any point or fact upon which you have changed your opinion with regard to this work from the beginning—from the time you first went to look at it—any point of fact upon which you have changed your opinion?
Admiral WALKER. Well, that would be pretty hard to answer. I went into the thing with my sympathies and prejudices, as far as I had any, in favor of the Nicaragua line, but I endeavored to take hold of this question with a mind open to proof.
The CHAIRMAN. I have no doubt that is so, but I want to know whether you have changed your mind upon any fact.
Admiral WALKER. I have changed it to this extent, that I now think that the best line is the Panama line, if that is a fact. That is an opinion; I do not think it a fact.
The CHAIRMAN. In an engineering sense?
Admiral WALKER. Yes; in an engineering sense.
The CHAIRMAN. Well, you come to that conclusion without changing any facts in your former statements?
Admiral WALKER. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. Your judgment is convinced that you were in error in the first statement?
Admiral WALKER. No, sir; not at all. I have not changed my mind a particle.

The statement of Professor Haupt, who was a member of the Nicaragua Canal Commission, and also of the Isthmian Canal Commission, on the point of the assurance of success on the two routes is as follows:

Senator HARRIS. The entire safety and efficiency of the canal in each case depends on the dam?
Mr. HAUPT. Unquestionably. There is no dam on the western slope in either project, for the reason that the inclosing locks and their retaining walls constitute the retaining wall for the water on the west side of the summit levels, so that the question of dams there is not involved.
Senator HANNA. That is slack water.
Mr. HAUPT. Yes; for the summit level.
The CHAIRMAN. Now, the question that you just answered of Senator Harris's relates to a plan in which one dam is held to be sufficient on the Nicaragua route and one dam on the Panama route, does it not?
Mr. HAUPT. It does; yes, sir.
Senator HANNA. Is there any way of which you are aware by which more than one dam could be used or relied upon in the Panama route?
Mr. HAUPT. No, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. With dams at intervals?
Mr. HAUPT. No, sir; there is not.
The CHAIRMAN. In the Childs survey and in the Lull survey there were a number of dams across a single river, I believe.
Mr. HAUPT. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Is that a practical method of constructing a canal?
Mr. HAUPT. Entirely so. That would reduce the height of the dam and the pressure or head of water and increase somewhat the expense and time of operation.
Senator HARRIS. It would require a greater number of locks?
Mr. HAUPT. Yes; if the lift is reduced.
The CHAIRMAN. If I remember it correctly, there was a dam at each of the rapids?
Mr. HAUPT. A dam at Machuca and one at Castillo, as well as others.
The CHAIRMAN. So that it is in an engineering sense practicable to build a canal on the San Juan River with several dams?
Mr. HAUPT. It is; yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Whereas that is not practicable on the Panama route?
Mr. HAUPT. There was a dam proposed at Gamboa in an earlier plan, but it was found to be impracticable and it was abandoned, and Bohio is believed to be the only safe dam site of that route.
The CHAIRMAN. I am only asking your opinion as an engineer.

Gen. Peter C. Hains, who was a member of both commissions, testifies as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Has Mr. Childs always been regarded by engineers as a good authority?
Colonel HAINS. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. Have the accuracy and faithfulness of his surveys ever been questioned?
Colonel HAINS. Wherever we have had occasion to go over the same ground that he went over we have found that his work was generally reliable.
The CHAIRMAN. Where he established bench marks, your surveys corresponded?
Colonel HAINS. I do not know whether we found any of his bench marks. I doubt whether any of his bench marks were found at all. It is so long ago that I guess they have all disappeared.
The CHAIRMAN. Is that a practicable canal, that depth and that prism, running in the manner in which he surveyed it, for ships that would draw less than 17 feet of water?
Colonel HAINS. I do not think there is anything impracticable about it.
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Childs's plan, if I remember it correctly, was for a dam at every one of the rapids of the San Juan River.
Colonel HAINS. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. He took them one after the other and built low dams.
Colonel HAINS. Yes; put low dams in.

He further states:

The CHAIRMAN. The length of the canal in the Lull survey is 181.26 miles, according to the report. The prism of the canal in the earth, bottom width, was from 50 to 72 feet, according to conditions and circumstances.

Colonel HAINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. In the rock it was 60 feet, and the depth of the canal was 26 feet. The locks were 70 by 400 feet, and there were 21 of them. I forgot to mention that in the Childs survey there were 28 locks.

Colonel HAINS. Different lifts.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Now, Lull's estimate was $65,722,147, and his unit of prices for work in rock was $1.25 to $1.50; for earth work 35 cents, and for dredging 30 to 40 cents per cubic yard; for embankments 10 cents, and for concrete $8 per cubic yard; for rock under water $5 per cubic yard. Would that be a practicable canal at that depth, and with that prism, in those waters, across from ocean to ocean?

Colonel HAINS. Yes; if I have this project in my mind correctly.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, the Commission of which you were a member, the Nicaraguan Canal Commission—you were a member of that?

Colonel HAINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. They estimated the length of route at 187.31 miles. You said that you had spent some months in making that survey.

Colonel HAINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How long?

Colonel HAINS. You mean this last one?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; I mean the one that you and Mr. Haupt and Admiral Walker were on.

Colonel HAINS. I spent about three months down there.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many engineers did you have under your employment?

Colonel HAINS. I should say from 30 to 50; I don't remember.

The CHAIRMAN. Skilled engineers?

Colonel HAINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many employees were there of all kinds, including the engineers.

Colonel HAINS. I do not remember. I suppose a couple of hundred—two or three hundred.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, you made a very careful survey, did you not?

Colonel HAINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. One that you are willing to stand on and make recommendations on for spending money by the Government?

Colonel HAINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And you made a survey on a line of 187.31 miles, and then you had a bottom in earth of 150 feet and you had a bottom in rock of 150 feet and you had a depth of 30 feet. Your locks were 80 feet by 620 feet. Those locks would accommodate 90 per cent of the ships in the world now?

Colonel HAINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Maybe more. Then you had 10 locks, 5 on a side?

Colonel HAINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of passage you did not give, but you had an estimated cost of $118,113,790?

Colonel HAINS. No; I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean the Commission did—the majority?

Colonel HAINS. The majority of the Commission did; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you dissented?

Colonel HAINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you put your price at what?

Colonel HAINS. About $135,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. So that the difference between you was between $118,000,000 and $135,000,000 for that construction?

Colonel HAINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the unit prices that you adopted were as follows: In rock, $1.03 to $1.30 per cubic yard; in earth, 44 cents per cubic yard; in dredging, 20 to 30 cents per cubic yard, and the embankment you did not make any provision for. You did not make any estimate. For concrete, $7.23, and for rock under water, $5 a cubic yard. Now, was that a good canal? Where did you have your dam?

Colonel HAINS. Was it a good canal?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; was that a safe, reliable canal?

Colonel HAINS. I think that it was a practicable canal.

The CHAIRMAN. And one that the Government could afford safely and reliably to build, and depend upon it to spend its money?

Colonel HAINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And one that would stay there after you put it there?

Colonel HAINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you have your dam?

Colonel HAINS. At Boca San Carlos.

The CHAIRMAN. How high was it?

Colonel HAINS. I think it was about 110 to 120 feet in the deepest part; something like that.

Senator HARRIS. I have one more general question that I wish to ask you. Is there any engineering work on the Nicaragua line that is not easily within the limits of present engineering experience and knowledge?

Colonel HAINS. On the Nicaragua?

Senator HARRIS. Yes.

Colonel HAINS. I think not.

Senator HARRIS. There is no work there, either in the way of dams or locks or cuts, that involves any new and untried problems?

Colonel HAINS. No, sir.

Senator KITTREDGE. Is there on the Panama?

Colonel HAINS. I do not think there is in Panama, unless it is this dam.

Senator HARRIS. Well, I thought we had discussed that, and I will put the additional question and refer to what Mr. Morison says. Mr. Morison thought it involved "new and untried problems," the construction at this dam.

Colonel HAINS. Yes.

Senator HARRIS. And you agree with that?

Colonel HAINS. Yes; I agree with that.

Senator HANNA. Would you consider these untried problems as problems that could not be overcome in engineering?

Colonel HAINS. No, sir.

Senator HARRIS. Is there anything now among engineers that is not regarded as possible, given money enough and time enough?

Colonel HAINS. Very little.

Senator HANNA. Do you believe generally that the Bohio Dam, as recommended by the Commission, can be constructed for the amount of expenditure estimated?

Colonel HAINS. Yes; I think it can.

Senator HANNA. Your part of the work on this Commission was confined to Nicaragua—that is, you were on the committee that examined Nicaragua more specially?

Col. Oswald H. Ernst states as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Now, there have been many lines run through Nicaragua along that line, commencing with the line run by Childs. That was a piece of engineering I have heard very highly applauded by engineers as being exact.

Colonel ERNST. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And Childs's survey has been taken as the basis of all the subsequent surveys, so far as his route corresponded with others?

Colonel ERNST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Childs put in a canal there with 17 feet depth of water, a harbor at Brito at the mouth of the little river there.

Colonel ERNST. The Rio Grande.

The CHAIRMAN. No, this way, at the lake—Las Lajas—and then at Grey Town, but the bay was there at Grey Town when he made his survey at deep water, and his survey included a slackwater navigation of the San Juan River, with dams at all the rapids—three or four dams—and he took his canal out in the vicinity of the mouth of the San Carlos, somewhere, and carried it through that level country down to Grey Town. That was a safe canal, was it not?

Colonel ERNST. Well, I do not know about below the San Carlos. I think he would have had trouble below the San Carlos.

The CHAIRMAN. He did not have slack-water navigation below San Carlos, as I remember it.

Colonel ERNST. My recollection of it is that he had, but I may be mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. But it was considered that that would have been a safe canal, if constructed, for ships drawing, say, 15 or 16 feet of water?

Colonel ERNST. Oh, I think so. I think that Childs would probably have changed his lines a little below the San Carlos, but, while I think so, I repeat that I think it was an admirable plan.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. And then after Childs came Lull, and Mr. Menocal was his chief engineer, and they followed Childs's line, and adopted the slackwater system in that survey down to a point near the mouth of the San Carlos River, if I remember correctly, and then took the line through that low ground around to Grey Town, where there was still a good harbor, or a fair harbor. That canal was 24 or 27 feet deep. I have the data somewhere here, but I have not got it so that I can refer to it just now. That would have been a safe canal, would it not?

Colonel ERNST. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. Slack-water navigation. And it would have been a very useful canal to the commerce of the world, would it not?

Colonel ERNST. I should think it might.

The CHAIRMAN. With ships of the size then in vogue.

Colonel ERNST. If they had got it done before the ships increased too far. The trouble with all of our great enterprises is that before they are finished they are outgrown.

THE CERTAINTY OF SUCCESS CONFIRMED BY ALL THE COMMISSIONERS AS TO FIVE SEPARATE PLANS SURVEYED AND LOCATED.

We have surveyed, plotted, located down to the working point five or six canals through Nicaragua, at a cost to us of more than $2,000,000, and we have demonstrated to the world that a canal can be built there for $68,000,000, and I shall be greatly disappointed, if we should take the Panama Canal, if Nicaragua and Costa Rica are not able to find friends enough to build that canal and plank us out of 600 miles of length of line and take away from us our coastwise trade. I should dislike very much to risk as against my Government the energy and enterprise and sagacity of men who built railroads across this continent, when they undertook, if they should undertake to do it, to have a canal also to work in combination with them, and I should doubt very much the enterprise of these Frenchmen, if we should pay them $40,000,000, and they should undertake to build one of these canals, even that located by Childs, by Lull, or by Menocal.

No member of either of the three commissions expressed a doubt or apprehension as to the certainty of the successful completion of a canal on the Nicaraguan route on either of five plans that have been adopted, surveyed, and located by the greatest engineers in America; from the slack-water plan of Childs, for a canal 17 feet deep, to the mammoth plan of the Isthmian Canal Commission, with a single dam at Conchuda to raise the San Juan River to the lake level, and to give unbroken summit-level navigation from Lock No. 4, which is 46 miles from the 6-fathom curve in the Caribbean Sea, to Lock No. 5, a length of 129.24 miles, in which there is only one curve with a radius of 4.045 feet, the other 26 curves being greater in radius, ranging from 4.297 to 17.189.

And no other engineer has seriously questioned the fact that within the limits of a reasonable cost a perfectly feasible and permanent canal can be constructed on the Nicaragua route.

MR. COOLEY'S OPINION AND ITS VALUE.

On the contrary, such an engineer as Lyman E. Cooley, who located and built the great Chicago drainage canal and many other public works, who examined both these routes in 1897–98, in company with other engineers and contractors, with the purpose of contracting to build the Nicaragua Canal, states as follows in respect of the certainty of success in constructing a canal on the Nicaragua route. After discussing questions of doubt as to the Panama route, as to which he had fewer engineering objections than some of the Isthmian Canal commissioners, he says:

The CHAIRMAN. Now, how many of these doubts and difficulties, if any, exist on the Nicaragua route?

Mr. COOLEY. Why, there is nothing about the matter as I have outlined it about which I have any doubts. A man in the face of a new problem feels, I imagine, as a general feels in the face of a battle; he does not like it, but he is up against it and he has got to fight it out. So, in regard to my mental attitude on the Nicaragua route, I have not nearly as many doubts about the building of a canal at Nicaragua as I had about the Chicago canal before we had actually let the contracts.

No statements of reports made in respect to this subject are of greater value than those made by this great engineer and canal constructor in his deposition.

He took what some designate as "a business view" of the subject, having great practical experience and great ability as an engineer and canal constructor, and no sentimental or official prepossessions to warp his judgment or to color his opinions.

MR. MENOCAL'S OPINION AND ITS VALUE.

Mr. Menocal, as the chief engineer of the Lull survey, made the first survey of a canal line at Panama in 1875, and pointed out, measured, and located the line for a lock canal that was adopted by the Panama company and is now adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission, including the dams at Alhajuela and Bohio. The canal he projected was 24 feet deep and from 60 to 72 feet wide at bottom, with 22 locks. The summit level was 124 feet above sea level and it was 30 miles long. He had previously, in 1872, surveyed the Lull canal line through Nicaragua, as chief engineer of that expedition. The dimensions of the canals in the two surveys were only slightly different, so that he had the earliest opportunity to compare them.

In 1879 he was appointed a delegate to an international canal congress at Paris, by the President, in company with Admiral Daniel Ammen. At that meeting they pointed out the impossibility of maintaining a sea-level canal at Panama, and the advantages of the route through Nicaragua for a canal with locks.

In 1872, after the Lull survey of a canal at Panama, De Lesseps endeavored to obtain a concession for a canal from Nicaragua, which was refused. He then turned his attention to a sea-level canal at Panama. The warnings of Ammen and Menocal as to a sea-level canal at Panama were disregarded by the congress at Paris in May, 1879, and their verification has proven to be one of the severest financial blows a country ever received. In March, 1880, while De Lesseps was visiting the United States and was preparing his campaign of promotion for the sea-level canal, and organizing the "American committee," into whose hands were paid 12,000,000 francs, he stated, before a committee of the House of Representatives, as follows:

> There were fourteen projects of canals presented at the Paris congress, but the interest has centered entirely in the Nicaragua and Panama routes. As to the Nicaragua Canal, Mr. Menocal gave explanations of it to the committee as he had given to the Paris congress. One of the objections to that route was that it would be necessary first to construct a harbor at Brito, and another objection to it was that it was impossible by that route to make a sea-level canal. If it were determined to build a lock canal, and if there could not be a canal between the two oceans except a lock canal, then there was no doubt that the Nicaragua route was the best route.

Menocal personally surveyed both routes more than twenty years ago, and has since made two additional surveys of the Nicaragua route, one for the United States and the other for the Maritime Canal Company, besides his survey of the San Juan River and Greytown Harbor for the Government of Nicaragua.

No living man more thoroughly understands every engineering fact as to the Nicaragua route than he does. And few better understand the Panama route, on which he spent more than three months at work in the field, against two weeks of observation by the engineers of the Isthmian Canal Commission. Professor Haupt, of the Isthmian Canal Commission; Mr. Harvey, who planned and constructed the first locks at the Soo St. Mary's Canal, and made a close study of these routes; Lyman E. Cooley, who has studied both routes, on the ground, by careful inspection and careful examination, both as an engineering and as a "business proposition;" Mr. E. D. North, of New York, an eminent engineer; Mr. Trundle, who located the canal lines for the Nicaragua Canal Commission and for the Isthmian Canal Commission, and Gen. E. P. Alexander, the engineer who located the eastern boundary between Nicaragua and Costa Rica, all these and many more great engineers sustain Mr. Menocal's statement that there is no uncertainty as to the construction of a canal on the Nicaraguan route.

Mr. Menocal made the following statements in his deposition:

> The CHAIRMAN. Now, you seem to be personally familiar with the ground of Panama, and also personally familiar with the ground of Nicaragua. You have stated how many surveys you have made there?
> Mr. MENOCAL. Yes.
> The CHAIRMAN. And how much attention you have given to the subject. Because of the surveys you have made at Nicaragua, have you discovered any point in your surveys which makes it doubtful as to the practicability of a canal there?
> Mr. MENOCAL. I have not.
> The CHAIRMAN. Do you feel certain, as an engineer, that a canal is practicable?
> Mr. MENOCAL. I do.
> The CHAIRMAN. On the Nicaragua River?
> Mr. MENOCAL. I do.
> The CHAIRMAN. Leaving the question of the selection of the lines aside entirely?
> Mr. MENOCAL. Yes; I do under those conditions.
> The CHAIRMAN. I ask you, from the survey that you first made down to the last survey that has been made there and reported, including the one you made across the divide, a short line, have you any reason as an engineer to believe that either of those surveys is impracticable?
> Mr. MENOCAL. I have not.
> Senator HARRIS. In addition to the fact of your personal knowledge, you are also familiar with the surveys and opinions that have been made by other engineers in regard to it?
> Mr. MENOCAL. Yes.
> Senator HARRIS. Have you ever heard of any engineer condemning the Nicaragua route as impracticable?
> Mr. MENOCAL. I have not.
> Senator HARRIS. My impression has been that it never has been pronounced anything but feasible.
> Mr. MENOCAL. I never heard an engineer condemn it as impracticable. There have been several routes——
> Senator HARRIS. Oh, there are variations, of course.
> Mr. MENOCAL. Yes, variation; but every one of them is practicable.
> Senator HARRIS. While we are on the Nicaragua line I would like to ask another question concerning that line. All of these various plans that have been proposed by yourself and all engineers contemplate the use of the upper part of the San Juan River, practicable for slack-water navigation?
> Mr. MENOCAL. Yes.
> Senator HARRIS. Do you not regard the curvature of that upper water of the San Juan under any of the plans that you have examined—that of the Commission most particularly—as impracticable or unsafe in any way?
> Mr. MENOCAL. Oh, not at all. There is nothing impracticable in them. They are perfectly feasible.
> Senator HARRIS. And that it is available for navigation at night with the ordinary electric light?
> Mr. MENOCAL. Just as well as in the daytime; yes, sir.
> Senator HARRIS. So that in the thirty-three hours described by the Commission as the time of passage will mean thirty-three continuous hours, and not portions of three days as suggested?
> Mr. MENOCAL. There is no reason why it should not be so. It has always been contemplated by me that the canal would be navigated day and night.
> Senator HARRIS. The same as the Suez Canal is?
> Mr. MENOCAL. Precisely, just the same; better than the Suez Canal. The Suez Canal goes through shallow lakes also. They have had to excavate canals through these lakes, and they navigate the Suez Canal day and night.
> Senator HARRIS. The channel can be so marked that there is no difficulty in navigating it at night?
> Mr. MENOCAL. No, sir; especially in a country where you have no fogs.
> Senator HARRIS. They have no fogs?
> Mr. MENOCAL. No, sir; always a clear atmosphere, day and night.
> Senator HARRIS. Reverting to the question we touched this morning a little, do you think that the minimum or the greatest curvature which is indicated by the Commission is such as to permit vessels to move around freely without the use of tugs to assist them?
> Mr. MENOCAL. I do.
> Senator HARRIS. And under their own steam?
> Mr. MENOCAL. Yes.
> Senator HARRIS. And how is it with sailing vessels through the upper part?
> Mr. MENOCAL. They will have to be towed, except across the lake, where they can use sails as there is always a breeze on the lake.
> Senator HARRIS. Of course, in the canal in every case?
> Mr. MENOCAL. That will be the same in every canal.
> The CHAIRMAN. Now, I want to ask, with your knowledge of hydraulic engineering, which is great, with regard to the double flight of locks, which is recommended at Bohio, with a maximum lift of 45 feet each; how does that compare with any other lock that you have knowledge of?
> Mr. MENOCAL. That is a larger lift than that of any lock that has yet been built.
> The CHAIRMAN. There has been no lock built with a lift of 45 feet?
> Mr. MENOCAL. No, sir.
> The CHAIRMAN. Is not the situation complicated by having a double flight; that is, two locks immediately after one another?
> Mr. MENOCAL. Yes; I think the mechanical difficulties of building a lock of a 45-foot lift will be overcome, but when you come to put the two locks together the difficulties are increased.
> The CHAIRMAN. That of course aggravates the situation?
> Mr. MENOCAL. Yes; very much.

PREFERENCE FOR THE PANAMA ROUTE IS NOT BASED ON ANY DOUBT AS TO THE NICARAGUA ROUTE.

If the preference given to the Panama route in the supplementary report of the Isthmian Canal Commission was based upon any physical or engineering fact, or conjecture, or belief, or opinion that the Nicaragua route is not feasible or practicable, or that it is not safe, useful, or profitable to the people or Government of the United States, the weight of evidence against such a conclusion is overwhelming. But such is not the case as to any feature of the subject. The only ground stated for such a preference is the alleged excess of cost of the Nicaragua Canal, and the cost of maintenance over the cost of completing and maintaining the Panama Canal and its purchase at $40,000,000, which supposed gain in such a transaction is estimated at $5,630,704.

This sum of money, not so great by one-half as we have expended on expositions in the last twenty-five years and less than one-fifth of the sum we have expended for Cuban independence and one-thirtieth part of what we have contributed for transcontinental railroads, is the bonus we are to receive for yielding forever the right already secured, if we choose to accept it, to construct a canal through Nicaragua and Costa Rica, which we have surveyed at a cost of at least $2,000,000.

WE CAN NOT AFFORD TO SURRENDER THE NICARAGUA ROUTE.

This is a canal that we have demonstrated to be practicable, feasible, permanent, safe, useful, and necessary to the people and Government of the United States.

It is a canal route that will pass into other hands and will be constructed, beyond our power to prevent it, unless by the employment of force and the disgrace of our country. It will be a canal which, in the control of any other power, can be used against us as a heavy handicap on our coastwise trade, or as a sword thrust between our coast line and the right arm of our naval power engaged in protecting the Panama Canal, 500 miles distant. It need not be deeper than 30 feet or wider than 70 feet to accommodate steamers and sailing ships that will take from us the short line between the oceans.

There ought to be reasons that are imperative to cause us to surrender such a canal for a possible saving of $5,630,704, but there are none that are either imperative or valuable, or that are inviting or well founded. On the contrary, there are facts, stubborn and inevitable, that block the way to the acquisition and use of the Panama Canal and railroad by the United States, not one of which can be removed by the expenditure of $5,630,704.

The feasibility, practicability, usefulness, permanence, and commercial value of the Panama Canal to the United States, are all clouded with many doubts, either one of which detracts more than that sum from its value, if there was no other possible route with which it could be compared.

THE DOUBTS AS TO THE PANAMA ROUTE MUST BE AS COSTLY AS 20 PER CENT OF THE ESTIMATES REQUIRED TO CONSTRUCT IT.

Engineers, when they have measured and completed the work on the canal, including every item of cost within the 20 per cent allowance on unit prices, and for all other contingencies, and have examined their work and called it good, as to the Nicaragua route, can not reasonably ask Congress to estimate the doubts they can not clear up, in advance of actual construction of the canal at Panama, at a rate of less than 20 per cent of the whole cost of that canal. The uncertainty of success, in that case, is quite as great a percentage of risk as the contingencies of the cost of construction at Nicaragua.

On an expenditure of $184,233,358, all of which may be lost, the contingency for doubts, an unknown quantity, at 20 per cent, is $36,846,671, or, if only $40,000,000 is at risk, the 20 per cent contingency for doubts is $8,000,000, which sweeps off the proposed gain of $5,630,704.

The existence of these doubts as to the Panama Canal is a substantial fact, a fact that can not be escaped, and the character of the doubts is such that they can only be resolved by actual experience in building, controlling, and maintaining the canal, and not by opinion in advance of construction, no matter what the weight of that opinion may be.

WHAT ARE THESE DOUBTS?

Some of the gravest of these doubts, as to engineering results, are admitted to be beyond the limit of all engineering experience. They are the conjectured opinions of enthusiastic engineers, and are not facts ascertained and demonstrated by actual engineering experience. The engineers on the Isthmian Canal Commission all admit that these doubts exist, and that they relate to unknown facts and untried experiments that are of vital importance. As, for instance, is pneumatic work indispensable at Bohio Dam?

This is scarcely a doubt, yet some of the engineers assert the opinion that it is not indispensable. If it is indispensable, can it be successfully done at Bohio dam?

All the engineers of the Commission are of the opinion that it can be done, while all admit that it can not be done without serious peril to human life, and all admit that it has never been accomplished under water at a depth of 127 feet. It is a forlorn hope of engineering audacity, and is most likely to find its Waterloo at Bohio.

Can these conditions be relieved by pumping? Pumping is, of old, the dernier resort of the Panamists. The comité d'estudes of the old company solemnly recommended pumping to supply the canal with water, and now an engineer commissioner recommends it to keep the water down to a level that will permit men at work to live under its pressure. Even freezing the Chagres waters around the caissons is coolly hinted at by some as the means of dredging under water at a depth of 127 feet.

Some of them say it can be relieved by pumping, and others are in doubt.

All the engineers, outside the Commission, refuse to accept the rock-bottom plan for a dam at Bohio, except General Abbott, and, while he is kindly disposed toward a rock dam if it can be built without too great cost, he prefers the clay dam of the comité technique, which they adopted because they doubted the practicability of reaching a rock foundation for the dam at Bohio.

The Culebra cut is a question of doubt, with its landslides, and creeping clays, and its indurated clay, that melts in water.

It is left expressly in doubt whether a dam at Alhajuela is necessary to control the floods in the Chagres River, and to supply the canal with water impounded there in reserve for the dry season; but all the engineers think it would be, at least, a good reliance in very dry weather.

Whether the Chagres River will repeat the floods of 1879 and remove, as it did then, the girders of the great steel bridge on the piers at Baracoa and flood the railroad track and the great swamps to the depth of 10 or 15 feet, and whether in such an event it can be shut out from the canal are matters of doubt. Whether any dam can stand such torrential floods and escape the fate of Johnstown and Austin are questions that only the Chagres River will settle in the course of time.

A safe harbor at Colon and the safe passage of ships through a submerged channel 3½ miles long at Panama when the wind rises and the tide is at the ebb are matters of doubt. They are matters in which doubts are apt to be resolved by destruction, as they have often been resolved at Colon. The abandoned anchors in the bay of Colon, left there by vessels that could not wait long enough to get them aboard when northers drove heavy seas into the shallow bay, are mute witnesses to the reasons for such doubts.

All these doubts and many others that relate to the cost of maintenance and the time of transit of ships from our Atlantic to our Pacific ports are resolved by the opinion of a greater number of engineers, of at least equally high authority, against the Panama route.

These doubts can neither be removed nor compensated for by any sum of money saved in the estimates for a canal. Especially is the sum of $5,630,704 insignificant when compared with these uncertainties.

The United States can not afford to take such risks in such serious matters for a supposititious gain of so small a sum.

Our people do not price their lives, or the prosperity of the 85,000,000 now concerned, or the hundreds of millions who will succeed them, at $5,630,704, saved in a bargain that creates doubts as to the national integrity in the minds of the people of all nations, especially the people of France.

A DOUBT AS TO HEALTH THAT RESOLVES ALL OTHER DOUBTS AGAINST THE PANAMA ROUTE.

The health of the Panama route can not be safely classed with the matters of doubt. It is a fixed condition that is in constant warfare with human life. It depends upon natural conditions that are beyond remedy, and as a fatal impediment to a successful gateway for the world it is beyond doubt.

THE DOUBT IS NOT AS TO ITS PRESENCE AT PANAMA, BUT AS TO THE CHANCES OF ESCAPING IT.

The constant presence of yellow fever and Chagres fever is not alone due to the filthy condition of the cities of Panama and Colon or to the unclean habits of the people, nor is it due to mosquitoes. These are aggravations of fatal fevers, that make them epidemic, but the seat, the habitat, the permanent home of yellow fever and dengue, or "Chagres fever," is in the city of Panama and the adjacent coasts.

From that center they spread through a fostering atmosphere and are transmitted by the constant and close association of a large number of people at work in a narrow space of country along the railroad and the canal diggings or traveling through it. Spreading from the principal breeding ground at Panama, these fevers permeate the atmosphere of the canal belt and spread through the hot depression leading to Colon, poisoning the people along the entire route, and from these seaports they move out on the ships and attack all other ports. The yellow fever at Panama is hostie humani generis, and all the world can not conquer it.

The reasons are obvious. They are, certainly, three in number: First. The tide of 20 feet that rushes into the bay twice in twenty-four hours, bearing the refuse of the sea and decaying animal matter and leaving it to rot on the hot beach when it recedes. Second. The exposure of thousands of acres of mud flats to the sun when the tide goes out, to give off their pernicious exhalations. Third. The absence of winds to scatter or take the poisonous exhalations away from the beach and the Bay of Panama.

THE CAUSES ARE NATURAL AND PERMANENT.

When these natural causes are removed, Panama can be made comparatively as immune from yellow fever as Habana and Santiago de Cuba appear to be. But they are immovable.

The tides at the coasts of Cuba rise to the height of about 20 to 36 inches, and leave very small margins of sea bottom when they ebb; while those at Panama rise 18 to 21 feet, and when they go out they leave a naked and vast inclined plane of many square miles, covered with mud and ooze and sea slime, in which shellfish and sea animals abound, to die and decay under a hot sun. The average width of this exposed area, around the Bay and Gulf of Panama, is not less than two miles, and when the tide recedes it is uncovered and so remains for twelve hours at least. At night the cooler temperature condenses the poisoned air, and it infects all the coasts of that bay.

These facts have always been regarded as being so important to the world that they have become a part of the history of the bay and city of Panama.

A LUGUBRIOUS HISTORY FROM AN OFFICIAL SOURCE.

The final report of the Isthmian Canal Commission of November 30, 1901, treats of the health of the Panama route in the following strong, graphic, and just terms. They say, in their final report, page 70:

> The climate of the isthmian canal regions is generally damp and enervating. The temperature is not extreme, rarely raising as high as 95° or falling below 70°, but the excessive humidity greatly restricts the capacity for physical exertion. The lowlands along the coast have long been known as insalubrious, and the seaports are subject to fevers. Perhaps the great difficulty to be encountered in the construction of the canal will be the procurement of an adequate force of laborers, and the preservation of their health and efficiency.

In this respect the Panama route has a lugubrious history, from which the Nicaragua route is free. The notorious mortality which attended the construction of the Panama Railroad and later the operations of the Panama Canal Company has taught a lesson which will not soon be forgotten for that route. Among the white employees of this Commission sent to Nicaragua there were fewer cases of sickness than there would probably have been among the same number of men employed in some parts of the United States. Among those sent to Panama the proportion of sick was greater. On the Nicaragua line during the operations of the Maritime Canal Company the health of the force was reported to be good.

This matter is so vital to the commercial world, to our coastwise line of traffic, to all travelers by way of the canal, and to the health of our seaports, that even this strong statement of the Commission is not a full and sufficient warning of the danger.

A MORE ANCIENT HISTORY, NOT LESS TRUE.

Capt. Bedford Pim, of the British navy, was sent along the Caribbean coast in 1861 to 1865 to ascertain its fitness for canal transit. Speaking of the country traversed by the line of railroad then in operation, he says:

The nature of the country through which the line of the road had to be carried was calculated to strike the hardiest speculator with dismay.

The first 13 miles from the Atlantic led through deep swamps covered with jungle, full of reptiles and venomous insects. In all muddy places down to the verge of the ocean are impenetrable thickets formed of mangroves, which exhale putrid miasma. Farther on the line runs through a rugged country, over rapid rivers and all sorts of impediments, and after passing the summit, descends rapidly to the Pacific.

The climate was also sultry beyond almost any other part of the world, while, during the wet season the rains descended in a perfect deluge. Moreover, to crown all, the resources of the country were found to be nil, or nearly so, and consequently everything, especially labor, had to be imported.

In 1825 Robert B. Pitman published in London "A succinct view and analysis of authentic information extant in original works on the practicability of joining the Atlantic and Pacific oceans by a ship canal across the Isthmus of America."

In his book he makes extensive quotations from the books of travel written by men of high reputation as geographers and scientists.

On page 175, Pitman, a British historian and geographer, gives the following quotation from Dampier:

I have said before that the bays have a greater quantity of rain than the headlands. The Bay of Panama will furnish us with a proof of this by its immoderate rains, especially the south side of it, even from the Gulf of St. Michael to Cape St. Francis; the rains there are from April to November, but in June, July, and August they are most violent.

The same author, after giving a description of a distemper which proved fatal to above thirty of his crew, and which he attributes to bad water, adds:

I have observed that in hot countries land floods, which pour into the channels of rivers about the season of the rains, are very unwholesome, for when I lived in the Bay of Campeachy the fish were found dead in heaps on the shores of the rivers and creeks at such a season and many we took up half dead, of which sudden mortality there appeared no cause, but only the malignity of the waters draining off the land through thick woods and savannas of low grass and swampy grounds, with which some hot countries abound.

On page 179, Pitman quotes from Wafer as follows:

Wafer nearly agrees in this general description of the site of Panama. He says: "Between the River of Cheapo and Panama the land is low, even land; most of it is dry and covered here and there with short bushes. The town is surrounded with savannas, gentle flat hills, and courses of wood;" but, he adds, "the place is very sickly, though it lies in a country good enough; yet it is healthy in comparison with Portobello." Of the last-mentioned place, De Ulloa observes: "The heat is excessive, originated by the situation of the town, which is surrounded with high mountains, without any interval for the winds."

Pitman adds:

Walton has urged the unhealthiness of the damp and heated climate of this Isthmus as one of the greatest obstacles to the opening of a canal across it, and has stated that the climate of Cruces is infinitely more healthy than that of Panama. He says: "Disease is a barrier against settling on the Isthmus to improve it, and that persons who have withstood every other climate, there become languid; and although the negroes appear fat and hearty, and are possessed of personal strength to bear the heaviest burdens, yet want alone impels them to work.

BARON HUMBOLDT.

Pitman adds, on page 180, the following extracts from Baron Humboldt's writings in 1803. He says:

M. de Humboldt has the following passage on this division of the subject: "For fifty years back, the vomito (black vomit of the yellow fever) has never appeared on any point of the coast of the South Sea, with the exception of the town of Panama. It is situated on an arid tongue of land destitute of vegetation; but the tide, when it falls, leaves exposed for a great way into the bay, a large extent of ground, covered with fucus ulvoe et meducoe; the air is infected by the decomposition of so many organic substances; and miasmata, of very little influence on the organs of the natives, have a powerful effect on the individuals born in the cold regions of Europe or in those of the two Americas.

"The causes of the insalubrity of the air are very different on the two coasts of the Isthmus. At Panama, where the vomito is endemical and where the tides are very strong, the shore is considered as the origin of the infection. At Portobello, where remittent bilious fevers prevail and where the tides are scarcely sensible, the putrid emanations spring from the very strength of the vegetation. A few years ago the forests which cover the interior of the Isthmus extended to the very gates of the town; the salubrity of the air has considerably increased since the governor gave orders for clearing away the wood in the neighborhood. Of all places where the manchineel and the mangle vegetate with vigor, the most unhealthy are where the roots of those trees are not constantly covered with water."

THE MODERN HISTORY OF YELLOW FEVER AT PANAMA.

This is enough as to the history of Panama one hundred years ago, but it is far worse half a century later.

The yellow fever still dominates its ancient realm and will do so until the three miles of sloping bottom out from the beach in the bay of Panama is dug out, and until the tides cease to wash the dead matter of that great gulf ashore, and until the winds, with a steady offshore current, shall visit a coast along which for periods of many months at a time in every year they have persistently refused to blow.

In the forty years from 1850 to 1890, when the Isthmus drew into its narrow confines many thousands of people to work on the railroad and canal; the toilers, under the infatuation of high prices for labor; the contractors, seeking great profits at the expense of human life; the speculators and robbers, seeking prey, and the officers grasping for high salaries, crowded into the canal belt, and the yellow plague and beri beri and Chagres fever rioted in human destruction.

Such a history was never made elsewhere by the ravages of disease. It can be repeated and will be while the natural and irremediable conditions continue to exist in the bay of Panama, when the fevers are fed with people who are from temperate zones and are unacclimated.

ACTUAL AND SCIENTIFIC KNOWLEDGE.

Dr. John F. Bransford, a retired surgeon of the Navy, was surgeon to the Lull survey in Panama in December, 1875, and in Nicaragua in 1872–73, and was detailed on duty with the Smithsonian Institution in 1876–77, and at other times has made careful and extensive examinations of a scientific character in Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Panama, including climatic and sanitary conditions, for which he is highly qualified.

In his deposition he states one cause for the permanent continuance of the yellow fever at Panama, and also for the fact that it has never appeared in Nicaragua along the proposed route of the canal, as follows:

Dr. BRANSFORD. I am quite sure the Isthmus of Panama is not a healthy country. That is the story of it, I think, always, everywhere. Up in the mountains of the interior it is all right; but along the Chagres River, and particularly along that Rio Grande which comes down near the line of the canal from the divide down to Panama, there is a great deal of mangrove swamp, and there is where we had our bad fever, where Mr. Tausig had his bad fever. That I consider a very unhealthy section. The trade wind does not blow home in the same way that it does in Nicaragua. The line of the Isthmus there is nearly east and west. Aspinwall is really west of Panama, and the trade winds are interfered with and deflected by the mountains east of Panama and the northern part of the State of Colombia, making a stagnation in the bay of Panama.

Senator HANNA. You spoke about yellow fever being prevalent at Panama. It has also been prevalent in Habana and Santiago de Cuba, has it not?

Dr. BRANSFORD. Yes.

Senator HANNA. Very severely?

Dr. BRANSFORD. Yes. If you will allow me, Senator, I may have used the word "prevalent," but what I meant was that cases were liable to occur at any time.

Senator HANNA. At any time of the year. I understood that. Well, after exercising proper sanitary methods in Habana and in other places in Cuba that trouble has been obviated very largely, has it not? Yellow fever has been reduced?

Dr. BRANSFORD. Yes.

Senator HANNA. The same thing applied in Panama would produce like results, would it not?

Dr. BRANSFORD. Well, it ought, as far as the yellow fever goes. I do not think anything will free the country of Panama fever.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was the chief engineer of Lull's expedition?

Dr. BRANSFORD. Mr. Menocal, and there was an engineer by the name of Crowell from Philadelphia, who was there also as an assistant.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you go ashore and remain ashore with the engineering party?

Dr. BRANSFORD. Yes; I was the medical officer of the surveying party.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the occasion when Lull made the survey of both routes, was it not, through Panama and also through Nicaragua?

Dr. BRANSFORD. I also went on another survey in 1875, with Captain Lull, when he surveyed the Panama route.

The CHAIRMAN. That was a separate survey?

Dr. BRANSFORD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. He made the Nicaragua survey first?

Dr. BRANSFORD. The Nicaragua survey first.

The CHAIRMAN. And then went to Panama?

Dr. BRANSFORD. Two years afterwards he went down and made the Panama survey.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he under the orders of the Government of the United States in making those surveys?

Dr. BRANSFORD. Yes; I was an assistant surgeon, and went as medical officer of both those surveys.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask you to take up the Nicaragua line first; and I want to ask you in regard to the health of the country, the health of your party, and such facts as will give the committee a fair and just idea of what was the condition of the health of Nicaragua as affected by the climate or by any other consideration that you studied.

Dr. BRANSFORD. I had only two serious cases of illness among those men during that survey.

Senator KITTREDGE. How large a party was it?

Dr. BRANSFORD. Forty-five, first and last, but it averaged 36. There were only two serious cases of illness on that expedition. One was a lieutenant-commander, who had a sunstroke, and another was an old case of dysentery, which had existed before the man went there. We had a good many cases of malarial fever, none of a very serious character, except that they would recur. That is, a man would have a slight attack of chill and fever, and after he got well it would come back on him.

Senator HAWLEY. Did the complaints there take the form of diarrhea at all?

Dr. BRANSFORD. We were very free from any bowel trouble at all, sir, very. The bulk of my practice was with light cases of malarial fever. We were there from the 20th of December until the 6th of July, and, as I said before, there were only two serious cases. Of course, there was malarial fever in the swamps, particularly there in the neighborhood of Greytown; but I think that the country generally is about as healthy as any tropical country that I have known.

The CHAIRMAN. In your practice there as surgeon of that party did you keep up with the body of the engineers who were surveying—the workmen?

Dr. BRANSFORD. I lived in one camp or another. They were divided into several parties, and I would go from one party to another, according to the necessities of my profession. Sometimes I would be with one party and sometimes with the other, but I was in the field all the time with one or the other of the parties.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you make any observations of climatic conditions, as to winds and other things?

Dr. BRANSFORD. The prevailing wind there is the trade wind. It is right in the trade-wind belt, and that is the prevailing wind pretty much the year round. It was much stronger in the dry season than in the wet season, but it blows home. I think the Ranger, a few years afterwards, on the west coast, found that the wind was to the east, northeast, or southeast for two hundred and eighty-three days during the year that she was there. That is the usual and prevailing wind. Occasionally in the wet season the wind hauled around to the southwest, and then heavy rains came.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that wind continue through the entire opening there up the San Juan River and the lakes and across to Brito?

Dr. BRANSFORD. All the way across the Pacific. It blows down in very heavy gusts on the Pacific side, which they call papagoyos, down the gulches at San Juan del Sur and Brito. The winds are often very strong, and the wind reaches all the way across.

The divide in Nicaragua runs about northwest and southeast, right across the track of the trade winds. The trade wind usually is east-northeast, and the line of that canal from Greytown to Brito is very nearly east and west, a little bit northwest from Greytown, but so nearly east and west that the wind draws right through that gap, and, in my opinion, is the most important factor in the health conditions along that route.

Senator HANNA. At about what rate does the trade wind blow there; how many miles per hour?

Dr. BRANSFORD. I do not know, sir; I could not say; but it usually commences up to the northeast and blows very strong for two or three days, sometimes four or five days, and then moves down toward the east and dies out a little and then shifts back again. I know that when I was there in 1876 and 1877—I was also in Nicaragua on duty connected with the Smithsonian Institution—very often the winds blew so strong, when I was on the west side of the lake, that I would not be able to go to Ometepec Island, where I was at work, for two or three days at a time sometimes.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you say you were doing on these last two occasions?

Dr. BRANSFORD. I went down at the request of the Smithsonian Institution on special duty, alone, on exploring duty for the Smithsonian Institution.

If Congress chooses to reinstate the horrors of Panama, the motive or the consideration should be something greater than the possible saving of $5,630,704 in the construction of a canal.

PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE.

The true history of the death rate at Panama was never written. It has been suppressed, At this date we can find but few men who knew and participated in that holocaust among the laborers who were stricken, to tell even what one man could see and know of these great battles with "the destruction that wasteth at night, and the pestilence that walketh at noonday."

The lives of the survivors were shortened and they have nearly all passed away. They were probably 30 years old, on an average, at that time, and if they were now living they would be from 60 to 80 years old.

One of the participants informed the committee of his personal knowledge of this matter, and, though he is old and sick from disease he there contracted, he came to Washington to testify, declaring that he had no personal interest to subserve, but that he is deeply concerned that his Government should not create the opportunity for repeating the terrible history of Panama. For nearly six years he was the track master of the Panama Railroad, and was constantly in contact with the laborers who, in great numbers, were at work on the railroad and the canal at Panama.

Mr. Plume states the following facts. His service with the Panama Railroad Company was from 1883 to 1888.

The CHAIRMAN. How many hands did you have under you as a rule—about an average?

Mr. PLUME. I had 10 men to every section, and a section run 4 to 5 miles.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many people did the canal company have there while you stayed there?

Mr. PLUME. Well, it was estimated that they had 10,000, but I doubt very much if 5,000 were working. The labor is of such a class that it is utterly impossible to get them to work; it is this lazy, good-for-nothing Jamaica labor, and the climate there is so bad that a man can not work.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, I want to get at that, and I want you now to be careful in your statements about that. Did you have any trouble in preserving the health of the party under your control—these 10 men to a section?

Mr. PLUME. Oh, a great deal, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the average amount of loss per annum, say during the five or six years you were there, out of your own party, now?

Mr. PLUME. Well, every month or two I would lose a man, perhaps two men. I will explain it to you. If a man gets wet there with the rain he is sure to be sick the next morning. The dew commences to fall at 3.30 o'clock in the afternoon, and if a man gets his clothes wet with this dew and he goes to bed with his clothes on, as sure as he is born he will wake up sick the next morning. I never saw such a climate in all my life, and I have worked in the rice fields of South Carolina, and gracious only knows that is bad enough.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you give the committee some idea of the condition of health of these canal laborers during the time you were in this Isthmus?

Mr. PLUME. When I went there we used to run one train—perhaps it would be a car or two box cars—in the morning out of Colon up to Monkey Hill. Our graveyard is about 5 miles from Colon, on a hill called Monkey Hill, but I had not been there a year when we were up there. Over to Panama it was the same way—bury, bury, bury, running two, three, and four trains a day with dead Jamaica niggers all the time. I never saw anything like it. It did not make any difference whether they were black or white, to see the way they died there! They die like animals.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what diseases would they die, if you know anything about it?

Mr. PLUME. There are four most deadly fevers. There is the yellow fever, the pernicious fever, the putrid fever, and the typhoid fever, and the intermittent fever. If the intermittent runs long enough it will turn into typhoid or those other bad fevers. A man will only last three or four days, unless thev have pretty quick and pretty severe treatment.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Panama Canal Company have good shelter for its hands and good hospitals?

Mr. PLUME. Yes, there is no finer hospital on the globe than the one they have at Panama. It is on the side of the Ancon Mountain, which used to be a volcano several centuries ago, and the lava from the volcano went across Panama and out into the bay about a mile. The hospital is a splendid thing. It is said to have cost $5,000,000, and I guess it did. Down in this valley you dig a hole about two feet deep and you come to a boiling spring, right under the mountains, and they have engines there pumping water up to this hospital. There is a man in Panama who has a concession to bury people. He opened a graveyard, I suppose 300 feet one way and 400 the other. Every grave is numbered that they may know who is buried there. In exactly one year after he opened it I drove by there, and there were 1,875 crosses in that burying ground, and that does not count the men that were in the ovens. They have ovens along the wall, a brick wall, and they bury people in there who can afford to pay for it; but there were 1,875 crosses in that burying ground, to give you a little idea of the health of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. About what year was that?

Mr. PLUME. That was in the early part of 1887. De Lesseps brought out 57 men there for engineers, chiefs of sections, and for different purposes, clerks. In three months, sir, there were only 3 of them left. I never saw anything like it in my life. If a man drinks there, he is just as sure to die as he is alive; it is fatal; and here is something very wonderful: I have always noticed if a Frenchman gets one of those fevers, he is just as sure to die as he has a hair on his head. The doctors have told me that it is on account of their having drunk so much of this French claret in France, which is full of logwood, and it has burned the linings of their stomachs, and as soon as they get a fever they die. My allowance of quinine was an ounce, and it would last me three weeks. That is what affected my hearing.

The CHAIRMAN. You suffer from it yet?

Mr. PLUME. What is that?

The CHAIRMAN. You suffer from it yet?

Mr. PLUME. Oh, yes, and never will get over it. I always took medicine, kept my liver clean, and that is the way I kept on my feet; and when I left that climate and came here a doctor worked six days and six nights on me to save my life. My brother-in-law told me that I must have a constitution of iron, and I believe I have.

OFFICERS OF THE PANAMA COMPANY TESTIFY.

Mr. Colné, who was the agent for the old company in America, states that the hospital expenses, not including the buildings, was $4,548,127 from 1881 to 1890, of which sum $680,000 was for medicine.

General Abbott testified that during the same period the annual average percentage of diseases at Panama was, for diseases of Europe, 18.83, and of diseases due to climate the percentage was 47.24. This related to cases treated in the hospitals, and proves that the local diseases were epidemic.

General Abbott tells of another "lugubrious" situation, as to the railroad laborers, as follows:

Now, I will offer all that I have been able to collect with reference to health on the Panama Railroad. There was a fearful loss of life during the construction of the railroad. I passed over the route in 1855, just after it had been finished. The surgeon of the steamer had been employed on the line, and he told me much about it. He said the conditions were something frightful—that they had to contend not only with disease, but with suicide. A great many coolies had been imported, and they were very unhappy and wanted to get back to China. They had an idea if they committed suicide they would go back.

The surgeon said it was necessary to watch them with the greatest care; that if a Chinaman found a little puddle of water he would hold his face down into it until he drowned, without exciting the attention or notice of anyone. The excessive death rate was due, doubtless, not only to the climate, but also to the conditions and to the various races that were tried. It was not then known that the heavy work should be done by negroes. I have no idea that anything like the mortality then encountered will be repeated on any isthmian line.

The CHAIRMAN. You never heard of a Chinaman committing suicide in Washington, did you?

If it had occurred to General Abbott to state that the name of the railroad station at Matachin means "dead Chinese," he would have been able to account for the fact that Chinese, when taken with the fever, would slip away from observation and drown themselves in puddles of water.

A NAVAL OFFICER TESTIFIES.

Commander Lucien Young states in his deposition as follows:

The most unhealthy place on earth is the Isthmus of Panama. I had yellow fever myself in Panama, and I have seen them dying by the wholesale; and so far as yellow fever is concerned, I would rather be in Habana than in Panama.

This evidence, with much more that it is unnecessary to quote, establishes the fact that yellow fever is indigenous at Panama and other localities of the canal route; that it is of malignant type and can not be extirpated, because it is the result of natural causes that human agencies can not change.

If the choice of routes for a canal depended upon this one fact, we would certainly be wise to turn to the Nicaragua route, even at an excess of cost amounting to $5,630,704.

One duty that the Government owes to humanity—which rises above all other personal considerations—in the choice of these routes is the care of the health and lives of men whose labor is the real power that must open this great waterway. No Senator can be indifferent to this demand of duty, nor can the Senate afford to take the risk of repeating the history of Panama during the thirty years of human sacrifice that have made it so lugubrious.

THE HEALTH CONTRAST BETWEEN THE TWO ROUTES.

If every other consideration of advantage was in favor of the Panama route, the salubrity of climate and the natural conditions that assure the health of Nicaragua would determine the choice in favor of that route. The contrast between these localities as places of abode gives great weight to the argument in favor of Nicaragua.

All maritime and civilized nations will use an isthmian canal, not alone for ships of war and commerce, but for migration and travel around the world and to and from every coast and seaport of every country, all of which will be brought by it into direct and unobstructed communication by the canal. The myriads of people of coming generations that will pass through a canal cut through the American Isthmus will have the right to reproach this Congress and will not fail to do so if we select for them a route on which pestilence lurks by the wayside, instead of a route that nature has made free from such dangers.

The saving of $5,630,704 will appear to them as a paltry consideration for the choice of a fever-breeding ground, when a healthy and attractive route for a canal is offered.

THE WALKER NICARAGUA CANAL COMMISSION'S REPORT OF 1899.

This question is not new. It arose at the first moment of a choice between these routes, as long ago as the sixteenth century. It was carefully studied by our Nicaragua Canal Commission, of which Admiral Walker was president, in 1897–1899, in view of objections then urged by the Panama Canal Company and others to the Nicaragua route, and the following answer was made by that Commission:

The impression that this portion of the Isthmus is unusually unhealthy is erroneous. On the contrary, the local conditions are such that with ordinary hygienic precautions the risks from disease are slight.

The frequent rainfall on the east coast furnishes an ample supply of fresh, soft water, condensed directly from the clouds. The porous, sandy soil absorbs it so rapidly as to prevent stagnation, while the animal refuse is quickly removed by the scavenger birds and fish continually on the alert for food.

With their light, loose clothing, vegetable diet, and cleanly habits, the natives seldom suffer from fevers. Even our unacclimated Americans, passing from a rigorous winter temperature to the mild region of the trade winds, were, with few exceptions, exempt from febrile complaints, and amongst the large number of engineers sent out there was no mortality in the country. The constant motion of the wind, sweeping through this low divide, appears to remove the noxious exhalations which characterize other portions of the Isthmus.

Yellow fever finds no habitat at Grey Town, and even when imported does not become epidemic. Abstemious habits and careful police of camps will insure as good health among laborers as will be found in many locations in this country. The climate would affect the labor question, therefore, chiefly by the lassitude resulting from its enervating influence.

Assistant Engineer Stewart says that—

"The atmospheric conditions are excellent, and for the seven months we were in the field we worked in all conditions of weather, losing but one entire day on account of a heavy downpour of twelve hours."

The narrow limits within which the temperature ranges are shown from a few selected observations at various stations during the year as below. The Rio Viejo station is located on the western slope of the Cordilleras, east of the lake, and at a higher altitude than the others. Hence its greater range of 30 degrees. This uniformity of temperature is one of the important factors in the consideration in the permanency of important works as well as in the health of the inhabitants.

It would be quite sufficient to stop at this conclusive statement, against which no fact is stated, but the subject was again opened on the hearings before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and some opinions were stated that the cutting of a canal in Nicaragua might produce health conditions there like those that exist at Panama.

WILL NICARAGUA FALL A PREY TO DISEASE LIKE PANAMA?

The importance of the subject justifies a brief statement of the facts deposed to by the witnesses before the committee. Dr. Bransford, whose statements as to the health of Panama and Nicaragua I have read to the Senate, has actual, personal, and scientific knowledge of this subject, makes the following statements as to Nicaragua:

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you remain on these two latter visits?

Dr. BRANSFORD. I think I went down each time in January and stayed until June. I am not absolutely sure of it, but that was about the time, from January to June, in 1876 and also in 1877. Then in 1881 I was down there again for the Smithsonian Institution, in Guatemala, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica.

The CHAIRMAN. What particular duty were you on then?

Dr. BRANSFORD. The same duty, examining the remains of the Indian inhabitants.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you much over the country while you were down there?

Dr. BRANSFORD. All the time. I was in the interior.

The CHAIRMAN. What kind of country—agriculturally, topographically, and with reference to climatic considerations—is Nicaragua?

Dr. BRANSFORD. Well, conditions are entirely different on the two slopes. On the Atlantic slope it is heavily wooded, and there is a much heavier rainfall than on the Pacific. Most of the population is on the Pacific side of the main range of mountians. The country along the route of the canal from Lake Nicaragua to Brito is one of the finest agricultural countries I have ever seen. Rivas is the principal town. There are half a dozen smaller towns around it, and the whole of that country from the lake to the coast mountains, a distance of some 8 or 10 miles, is a garden spot for tropical fruits, chocolate, sugar cane, and fruits of all kinds.

The CHAIRMAN. What kind of a population has it, with reference to industry, quietude, and general disposition?

Dr. BRANSFORD. The ruling portion of the population is the usual mixture of Spanish and Indian. They are about like all the other South Americans. Some of them claim to be pure Spaniards, and from that they are everything down to pure Indian. They have the characteristics of the ordinary Spanish-Americans, being inclined to revolutions and so on; but the main body of the population is a very sturdy Indian people. I think they are very much stronger, more reliable, better men, than the mixed.

Senator HAWLEY. Well-behaved?

Dr. BRANSFORD. They are, sir; as far as my experience goes. They are very steady and good workers. When we wanted good, reliable men for work we always tried to get the pure Indians.

MR. TREAT, A CONTRACTOR, TESTIFIES.

Mr. Treat, a contractor who built nearly 10 miles of railroad for the Maritime Canal Company, from Greytown west, made the following statements:

Mr. TREAT. It was a peculiar contract. I took it for the purpose of studying the questions of labor and climate and health and supplies, having in view a large contract on the canal, and I said if they would give me control of the whole thing, and not let the engineers interfere with me too much, and would furnish what I wanted from New York, I would build the railroad for 10 per cent of what I paid out for labor in the country, I paying my own office force and superintendent of construction. I commenced the work about the last of May, 1890, and finished my work about the last of December, 1890—I believe it was 1890.

The CHAIRMAN. What length of road did you build?

Mr. TREAT. Nearly 10 miles—perhaps a little less than 10 miles.

Senator HANNA. Standard gauge?

Mr. TREAT. Standard gauge.

The CHAIRMAN. Describe the point you started from and where you went.

Mr. TREAT. I started from the Greytown Harbor—that is, the lagoon—and went south of the canal line as located—parallel to it, perhaps a thousand feet away from it—directly to the westward, parallel with the canal line all the way.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you build out to the Deseado River, or stream?

Mr. TREAT. I think I crossed that; I am not sure.

The CHAIRMAN. What sort of a country was it that you went through?

Mr. TREAT. It was almost perfectly flat, you might say, covered with forests, the first 8 or 9 miles covered with water—completely covered with water.

Senator HANNA. How deep?

Mr. TREAT. From a foot up to over a man's head.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you construct a road through that water?

Mr. TREAT. I cut down trees and built a solid corduroy by laying the logs parallel to each other, perhaps 16 or 18 feet long, until I got above the water, and then I laid rails on top of this causeway of logs and put a steam shovel at work where the entrance was to be for the canal and loaded flat cars there with the excavation. I had two trains of flat cars, 15 cars to a train, and two locomotives, and then I backed these cars out on this track laid on the logs, and used a ballast plow, and in time completely buried this foundation taken from the entrance to the canal. I actually commenced the construction of the canal by taking out about 100,000 cubic yards at that point, and in time of course I buried this substructure completely with sand. Of course, as these logs were covered with sand, the track was raised and the sand tamped under it until a substantial road was built.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it a substantial road?

Mr. TREAT. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, at what cost per mile was that road built?

Mr. TREAT. The whole cost was about $30,000 a mile.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you get your cross-ties?

Mr. TREAT. I got some from the timber alongside the track, and some cypress ties from New Orleans.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many men did you have under you while you were at work there?

Mr. TREAT. Perhaps a couple of hundred at the start, up to the neighborhood of 1,000. I think I had nearly 1,000 after two months and from that up to the end.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you keep them there?

Mr. TREAT. Seven months.

The CHAIRMAN. State what kind of work they did.

Mr. TREAT. Why, of course a large part of the work was right in these swamps, in water. I cut down the trees and cut them up into lengths, some very large trees, 3 feet in diameter, mostly very heavy timber that would not float, and the work was to drag these logs through the water; they would so nearly float that 20 to 30 men would tie a rope to a big log and drag it along on the bottom to the place they wanted it and then turn it around on to the line of the railroad, so that the work that these men did was wholly cutting these trees and putting them in place to form a part of the embankment, a foundation for the embankment, and fully half of the men were working in this water ten hours a day.

The CHAIRMAN. Every day?

Mr. TREAT. Yes; every day. Out of seven months we lost only two half days from any reason, and that was on account of cold rains.

The CHAIRMAN. And that is all the time that you lost?

Mr. TREAT. That is all the time that we lost. We did not work on Sunday.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what was the condition of health of your men?

Mr. TREAT. Why, the first lot of men that we had there from Jamaica were a poor lot, picked up off the streets largely and in poor health, seemed to be half starved. I should say that their general health improved while they were on the work. At the end of the work they went away looking better and feeling better than when they commenced. They had good food, a good dry place to sleep, and when they were sick a good hospital to go to.

MR. MENOCAL.

Mr. Menocal, who has been more in Nicaragua than any other American engineer—in all, more than ten years of time—states as follows in speaking of Panama:

The CHAIRMAN. Do you consider that a healthy country?

Mr. MENOCAL. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you consider it very unhealthy?

Mr. MENOCAL. Very unhealthy.

The CHAIRMAN. How does it compare with Nicaragua in that respect?

Mr. MENOCAL. I regard Nicaragua as very healthy.

Senator HANNA. How would it be at Nicaragua if you were digging a canal there?

Mr. MENOCAL. We did do some digging in the canal.

Senator HANNA. What I mean to ask is, there has been digging done pretty much the whole length of the Panama Canal, the earth has been turned up by excavations made. Suppose you had corresponding excavations along the Nicaragua route from the valley of the San Juan River and you turned up the soil there, would you have any sickness from it?

Mr. MENOCAL. It is possible there may be some more sickness than they have now, but I can say this: We built 12 miles of railroad, 6 of which was in these swamps, and the men had to work in water from their feet to their necks, and we did not lose a man on account of sickness contracted by reason of the climate or the conditions under which the work was done. We had 1,800 men employed in the building of that railroad and we did dredging there for a distance of about seven-eighths of a mile into the swamps, and the condition of health of the people on board of the dredges was excellent, and those living in the vicinity just the same. I was not ill there myself, nor were the other engineers. We had cleared the timber for about 9 miles from Grey Town and about 10 miles on the west side of the lake, and we did not have any illness on that account.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that remark true through the entire line to Brito in regard to health?

Mr. MENOCAL. It is claimed, and I believe, that the more you go west the healthier it is. I would like to call the attention of the committee to one matter, if I am permitted to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. MENOCAL. I refer to one condition in Nicaragua which does not exist in Panama. It is very true that we have swamps back of Greytown extending several miles, but the rainfall is so great that the water in the swamps is renewed constantly. You can drink it at any place. We used to drink it constantly.

Senator HAWLEY. It is not stagnant?

Mr. MENOCAL. It is not stagnant. It is being renewed all the time from the heavy rains, while in Panama in the four or five months of dry season the swamps get dry, and then is when the sickness prevails. That is the time that the country becomes extremely unhealthy. It is not in the rainy season. What I fear is the dry season.

The CHAIRMAN. What effect do the trade winds have in Nicaragua, according to your opinion?

Mr. MENOCAL. The healthy condition of Nicaragua is partly attributable to the trade winds blowing up the valley of the San Juan, and I believe it is correct.

Senator HANNA. Let me ask you, what year did you do this work that you are talking about in Nicaragua?

Mr. MENOCAL. From 1887 to 1892.

MR. JONES TESTIFIES.

Mr. James O. Jones states as follows, speaking of the Nicaragua Canal Commission:

The CHAIRMAN. You were employed under that Commission for eleven months?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you in Nicaragua all the time?

Mr. JONES. I was in Nicaragua for eleven months, and I was here under the same Commission for about nine months.

The CHAIRMAN. Writing up their report?

Mr. JONES. In the Washington office, working on the precise-level report.

The CHAIRMAN. When you went back a second time, under what authority did you go?

Mr. JONES. I went back in July, 1899, under the Isthmian Canal Commission, headed by Admiral Walker.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you remain there on that service?

Mr. JONES. I was there from July, 1899, until May, 1901—about twenty-two months.

The CHAIRMAN. What were you engaged in while you were there on that service?

Mr. JONES. I was engaged in the hydrographic work under Mr. Arthur P. Davis.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you stop your work on account of the weather when it was raining?

Mr. JONES. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Here, when you were running the line, or when you were attending to this hydrographic work?

Mr. JONES. The rain did not stop my work at all. I was out in the rain and all kinds of weather while I was engaged in this hydrographic work, and when on the line of precise levels that I speak of was out in the rain all day. Of course, in the hardest showers or when it was raining very hard we could not work.

The CHAIRMAN. You were exposed to it?

Mr. JONES. We were exposed to all of it.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many men were in that precise-levels party?

Mr. JONES. There were six men.

The CHAIRMAN. And you continued at work for eleven months?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In the field?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the state of the health of those men during that time?

Mr. JONES. It was very, very good. They all had very remarkable health for the kind of country that we went through.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they have any sickness?

Mr. JONES. There was no sickness to amount to anything at all, None of the men were laid up.

The CHAIRMAN. During that eleven months?

Mr. JONES. Not to speak of. A man might be laid up a day or two or something of that kind occasionally, but never ill to speak of.

The CHAIRMAN. You were working right along through these ponds and water courses, and so on?

Mr. JONES. For some distance on the river we encountered heavy swamps. We worked right through them; worked in water up to our knees and sometimes up to our shoulders. We set up the instrument in water almost up to the thumbscrews.

The CHAIRMAN. And none of that party were sick to speak of, as I understand you?

Mr. JONES. No; there was no illness at all in the camp to amount to anything.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many men were engaged under Admiral Walker in Nicaragua on the isthmian canal survey?

Mr. JONES. The Nicaragua Canal?

The CHAIRMAN. The Nicaragua Canal survey.

Mr. JONES. Why, there were about seventy. There were sixty-nine men went down on the Newport and a few more came, and one or two returned to the States. There were about seventy men in all.

The CHAIRMAN. How long were those men employed on the Isthmus; I mean to say at Nicaragua?

Mr. JONES. Why, I suppose they were there for eight months anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. In the wet season or the dry season?

Mr. JONES. They were there through a period of both.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, did they work right along through these ponds and morasses?

Mr. JONES. Yes; they worked just the same as I did.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the state of the health of that party during the time they were there?

Mr. JONES. It was remarkably good.

The CHAIRMAN. Did any of them die?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; none of them died while the parties were there.

The CHAIRMAN. Were any of them sick?

Mr. JONES. There was some sickness, but nothing to amount to anything at all.

The CHAIRMAN. What kind of water did you drink while you were out there during all this long service?

Mr. JONES. We drank San Juan River water when we got to it, and when we were back away from it we would drink the waters from the small rivers that were tributaries of the San Juan. We would drink any water that we came to, almost; swamp water or anything else.

Gen. Edward P. Alexander testified as follows:

General ALEXANDER. After the civil war I was first professor of engineering and mathematics in the University of South Carolina for four years and then I went to railroading, and I was engaged in railroading generally as manager of roads with engineers doing work under me for some twenty years, more or less. Since then I have been on two governmental commissions, one on the improvement of The Dalles of the Columbia River, The Dalles and Salido Falls in Oregon, and one commission on the connection between the Chesapeake Bay and the Delaware Bay. These were joint commissions of civilians and Army and Navy officers generally. Then for three and a half years I was employed as engineer arbitrator of the boundary survey between Nicaragua and Costa Rica, by those two Governments.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you reside during the time you were thus employed by Nicaragua and Costa Rica?

General ALEXANDER. My headquarters were generally at Grey Town, Nicaragua.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you find the health conditions of Grey Town during your residence there.

General ALEXANDER. I found them very good indeed; never lived in a place that had less malaria.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there much population in Grey Town?

General ALEXANDER. No; very small; only about 1,400.

The CHAIRMAN. What years were these?

General ALEXANDER. 1897, 1898, 1899, and part of 1900.

The CHAIRMAN. I wish you would describe that country as to its eligibility for civilized people—for white people—its productions, and other matters connected with agriculture. Just give a description of it as you saw it.

General ALEXANDER. It impressed me as one of the most attractive countries that I ever saw for a poor man to make a living in. As I laughingly told the gentleman who was escorting me around, if I had to be born again I would ask the angel that was bringing me down to take me to Nicaragua, if I was to be landed without any money; that I would rather light in Nicaragua than in any other place I knew.

The climate is very pleasant. The agricultural opportunities are limitless. The soil is good, and I do not know a more attractive country than that.

The CHAIRMAN. Do they raise a variety of crops there?

General ALEXANDER. Everything in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the characteristics of the population?

General ALEXANDER. Its population are a good, plain, country people. They seem to be amiable, courteous, and polite, and I do not think they were specially disposed to go into insurrections or rebellions. They are industrious enough at anything—in fact, they are very industrious at anything that they are used to. They would not do much if you put them at a wheelbarrow and a ditch, perhaps, but put them in the woods with a machete or on the river with a paddle and they will do as good a day's work as any man that I ever saw. There are plenty of instances there of men whom I saw who are in very comfortable circumstances, who started out in life with nothing but a machete, who have got little coffee plantations, fruit plantations, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. Does coffee grow abundantly in that country?

General ALEXANDER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Of good quality?

General ALEXANDER. While I was there, in 1889, it was Nicaraguan coffee, raised in the vicinity of Matagalpa, that brought the highest price in London of any coffee sold that year from any part of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. That Matagalpa country is a white settlement, is it not?

General ALEXANDER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. A prosperous people?

General ALEXANDER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they peaceable and obedient to the laws?

General ALEXANDER. They seem to be so, entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you think of that region of country, including Costa Rica and other parts of Central America that would be accessible commercially to the canal, as a feeder to the canal, the income of it?

General ALEXANDER. I think it ought to be one of the richest tropical countries in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. Capable of sustaining large population?

General ALEXANDER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What would you expect from the health of the people?

General ALEXANDER. There is no trouble about the health anywhere in that country, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. You found it healthy?

General ALEXANDER. I found it so, entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have as good health there as you had at home in South Carolina?

General ALEXANDER. Entirely so; yes, sir.

Senator MITCHELL. That condition as to health applies to both sides of the divide, does it?

General ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.

Mr. H. H. Trundle, the engineer who surveyed and located the canal for the Nicaragua Canal Commission and also for the Isthmian Canal Commission east from Boca San Carlos to Greytown, testifies as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Would you think it any more difficult to construct a canal through that portion of Florida where you were than at Greytown?

Mr. TRUNDLE. No; I do not know that it would be any more difficult to construct. I notice one difference, though, that while I was in Florida I employed most of my men to help me there, and none of them would last more than a month or two. They would get sick or something and leave. One that I took down from here was sick there and had to leave, quite sick, and in Nicaragua we had very little sickness either among the natives or the men that we took from the States.

The CHAIRMAN. In the first survey you made for Admiral Walker's commission, or the Nicaraguan Canal Commission, about how many men, officers, and employees of every kind were under your charge?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Well, my party numbered about 6 or 7, and I had about 20 or 30 laborers, depending upon the country that I was going through.

The CHAIRMAN. How long were you engaged in the field there?

Mr. TRUNDLE. I think I was in the field about ten and a half months.

The CHAIRMAN. Ten and a half months consecutively, straight along?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the health of your party on that occasion?

Mr. TRUNDLE. I think I had one man at the hospital for a week or ten days, one officer, and then all of us, I think, had a day or two of sickness occasionally. I was sick three times, I think, but not sick enough to leave camp; and I would only stay in camp while I had fever, and then go ahead on the work. Among the laborers there was practically no sickness other than a few machete cuts that caused them a good deal of trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you and your men take the water as it came?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And the swamps as they presented themselves?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And went right through them?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Cutting your way with machetes?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. On the second occasion you had a larger party?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Yes; I had four engineer parties, each about the same size as my other party—four engineer parties of about six or seven men, and then each of those parties had from fifteen to twenty-five laborers.

The CHAIRMAN. How long were you in the field with those men?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Very nearly a year; more than eleven months, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. Consecutive work?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Every day?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the Isthmian Canal Commission work that you were doing then?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the health of your party then?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Well, the health was good. I had one or two men in the hospital two or three times for a few days. One man was quite sick. That is, he had some of the fever that they have down there, and he was pretty sick, but I don't remember how long he was in the hospital. I do not think he was there over ten days, if as long, and then he went out on the work again.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the only real sick man you had?

Mr. TRUNDLE. That was the sickest I had, and he was at no time dangerously ill.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the general health of your party?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Oh, it was good. It was better than I would expect anywhere that I have ever been in the States where I had as much swamp to contend with.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it as good as the health of your people when you were in Florida?

Mr. TRUNDLE. It was better.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you drink the water of the country as you came to it, or did you have a particular supply of water?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Well, I tried to have the water all boiled for drinking water in the camps, and I thought that I was succeeding pretty well; but since I have gotten back I have found out that I did not succeed quite so well as I thought. I attribute the health largely to the fact that the water was boiled, and I was speaking of it afterwards to some of the men, and they have told me since that they always kept the boiled water but they seldom drank it. I think all of them drank the water pretty much as they came to it. A good many of them used the water vine, and drank water from that.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a vine there that yields water?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Gives about a pint as you cut it?

Mr. TRUNDLE. Yes; you cut off about 3 feet of it.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the health of the natives in that part of the country who were employed by you?

Mr. TRUNDLE. They seemed to be healthy. They never lost much time, other than when they would get a chance to go to Grey Town and get drunk, or something like that.

MR. LYMAN E. COOLEY TESTIFIES.

Mr. Lyman E. Cooley, the engineer and constructor of the Chicago Drainage Canal, spent four weeks in the field in Nicaragua while the Nicaragua Canal Commission was at work there in 1899. In his deposition he makes the following statements:

The CHAIRMAN. As engineer for the contracting company in 1897 and 1898, of which you make mention, did you visit the localities of the Nicaragua and Panama Canal routes?

Mr. COOLEY. We went entirely over the Panama route and examined it in a casual manner. We examined the Nicaragua route with great care on the ground, as much as we could.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it a private enterprise?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What were you doing down there? What was your purpose in going there?

Mr. COOLEY. A number of gentlemen in New York were interested in the canal proposition financially, and had undertaken to finance the project of an interoceanic canal in case a group of contractors could put a price upon it. We went down there for the purpose of ascertaining whether we could put a price upon it or not.

You are in a wilderness in much of Nicaragua. It is not easy to see things. The physical discomfort in getting around is simply enormous on the eastern division. Fortunately I had the good sense, I congratulate myself on that, to select men who were pioneer men, who had been doing pioneer work, not municipal contractors, but men who had been out against the frontier, and engineers of the same class, who would not be deterred by an unbroken wilderness.

And one of these men remarked, in a very significant way, that if the country was cleared up, if there were roads where men could ride about with a buggy and get around comfortably, and if there were good hotels at convenient intervals, it would make every difference in the world in a man's mental attitude. You may look for the average man who undertakes to examine these routes to be in favor of Panama for that reason. I did not discover anything in Nicaragua that was equal to an Arkansas canebrake in the St. Francis bottoms. I did not discover anything in the way of a forest that was equal to a Wisconsin forest. I did not discover anything in the way of insects that was equal to experiences I have had on the Missouri River bottoms in the State of Nebraska.

We looked particularly into the health conditions, and I am just as confident of the health conditions in Nicaragua as I am along the Gulf coast of the United States; and I am not as confident of the health conditions at Panama.

I believe that those conditions, the mere difference on that one thing of comparative health alone, will make the difference between a profit and a loss to a syndicate that undertakes to build these works. I believe, further, that if you will take the $40,000,000 with which it is proposed to buy the situation at Panama, and spend that sum judiciously in Nicaragua, and then recall this same Commission, there will not be a question of doubt as to the superiority of the Nicaragua route in the mind of any man who has signed this last report. That is my best judgment, and I am very firm in that conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. I wish now, Mr. Cooley, to get your views on the commercial and military advantages of the Nicaragua route as compared with the Panama route, for the benefit of the United States Government and the people of the United States, and I will begin by asking you first as to the possibility of a local development of production and concentration of population on the Nicaragua route; and the basis of that would be, first, the temperature of the country and its healthfulness. I ask you now, if you please, to describe that country with reference to this matter.

Mr. COOLEY. I looked into that phase of it for the reason that, as a commercial enterprise, which was then proposed, the question of what assets could be created by a corporation building the canal there was a very material question as to its profits, and whether it was justified in undertaking the scheme at all or not.

Nicaragua lies practically in the same latitude north as Java or the East Indies lie in the south. It has every variety of climate, from the lowlands, where they produce indigo and cocoa and various fiber plants and fruits, clear up to the frost line.

The CHAIRMAN. Rubber?

Mr. COOLEY. Rubber trees, yes; and at an altitude of 1,200 to 1,500 feet you strike the coffee belt, extending to the frost line, and up at the frost line and above you can raise the northern cereals and vegetables. At a market in San Jose I saw a collectian of kitchen truck raised in Costa Rica near the frost line in the month of February that would duplicate a northern market garden.

You can select your climate. Nicaragua, Honduras, and Costa Rica, in an area of perhaps 50,000 to 60,000 square miles naturally tributary to the Nicaragua Valley—more than the State of New York, more than the island of Java—has every variety of climate. I mention the island of Java because it is one of the most highly developed spots on earth, carrying a population of 24,000,000 on 47,000 square miles. I believe that Nicaragua has as large a potential, from the Pacific at the Bay of Fonseca through to the Caribbean. Whether the country east of Castillo will be susceptible of much development I do not know. They have developed a good deal on the Rama River, and at Bluefields and at Limon they have done considerable in the way of producing bananas. The bananas of the United States coming into New Orleans come largely from Bluefields, and the bananas going to New York come largely from Limon, Costa Rica, and in the interior you can produce everything that a tropical country produces.

As to the health conditions, I made diligent inquiry, on the western division, of Dr. Flint, a man over 80 years old, at Rivas, who has lived in the country since 1848 as a practicing physician, and of Dr. Cole, who has been there since 1854, at Rivas. I could not learn that they had any diseases which we need be apprehensive about, especially on the western division, and that it was immune, you might say, from such things as kidney troubles and rheumatism.

The CHAIRMAN. Pneumonia?

Mr. COOLEY. No; they have pneumonia everywhere on earth. Tuberculosis is not in the country, I believe. I asked Dr. Flint, after I had gone over the entire catalogue, what the people really did die of, because it was evident that they died. He said that the majority of the death rate in this country is due to lack of proper nutrition and to dissipation.

On the Atlantic side we had Dr. Soto, who accompanied our party as physician to see that none of us got into ill health, and we got from him the statistics of what little experience they had had at Grey Town with the force that they worked there when he was the company's physician. He asserted that there had never been a case of yellow fever at Grey Town, unless it was sporadic, and had been brought there. There had been only four cases that he knew of as a matter of fact, and that the so-called yellow fever, jungle fever, spotted fever, or whatever you call them, which all belong to the meningitis type, were not virulent. That was also the testimony of Dr. Flint and Dr. Cole.

A year later a physician came to my place in Chicago and wanted to go somewhere in the Tropics. There were four of them in the party bent on new experiences and scientific collections, and I advised Nicaragua, and asked that they investigate especially the health condition there.

One of these gentlemen turned up in my office three or four months ago. He had spent four months in Nicaragua, and as a physician he had inquired diligently. He had spent part of his time in the Silico lagoon country down around Grey Town hunting alligators and collecting specimens for museums. He said he had absolutely no trouble, and he finally summed up the situation as his personal opinion that no man need die in Nicaragua except of old age, if he will take care of himself.

Now, the evidence of our own party was that we took 15 men across the Isthmus. It was a question whether we should make special provision and take special precaution about the water and things of that kind. Mr. Mason very sensibly remarked that if we ever did business in that country we would have to drink the water that was in the country, and he was going to drink it all. So we all did the same. We drank all the water we came to, from one side of the Isthmus to the other.

The CHAIRMAN. Took it as you came to it?

Mr. COOLEY. Oh, yes. There were some streams that we avoided, of course, used our horse sense about, just as we would in the United States. And there was no man in our party who suffered from it. On the Pacific side we rode horses and some of us had not been on horseback for years. Some were men of age, and we went right out there for four days and camped on the ground, and slept out nights. On the Atlantic side we walked under very great fatigue and camped out every night, and no man was inconvenienced, although the fatigue was as great as you could experience under any conditions in the United States.

None of us experienced any inconvenience except Mr. Stephens, who ought not to have taken that trip, because he was a man nearly 60 years of age, and he got very much exhausted, tired out, and when he got up to San Jose, Costa Rica, he had a little touch of intermittent fever that lasted him a week and was very light. That was the only experience of that kind we had. And I feel confident that if we had stopped at Grey Town a couple of days longer and rested, he would not have come down with it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that a good fruit country?

Mr. COOLEY. I was shown an orange tree at Grey Town from which they had picked 200 boxes of fruit the previous year.

The CHAIRMAN. Two hundred boxes?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many in a box?

Mr. COOLEY. I don't know how many. There are about 125 in the ordinary shipping box. That was told to me by the consul at that point. At Castillo I picked limes off of trees that were loaded.

On the Pacific side the oranges were growing wild. There was no market for them. The citrus fruits, I think, grow well all the way across.

The CHAIRMAN. And cocoa?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes; that is the chocolate bean. Manier, the French chocolate man, whose brand you buy all over the country, has his plantations near Rivas.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an attractive country in its topography and scenery?

Mr. COOLEY. The shores of Lake Nicaragua are beautiful as a dream. Lake Nicaragua is about half as big as Lake Ontario. If I was leading the ideal life which some people are striving for I should spend six months of the year on Lake Nicaragua, or in that valley there after this canal was opened.

I feel a kind of indignation when I hear people talk flippantly about this health question. I remember that the army, the crack service of the United States, with selected lives, were not able to do as well in Cuba or as well at Chattanooga, right in our own country, as we did on the Chicago Drainage Canal with 8,000 hoboes picked up from all creation. There we had as good a condition of health as in the best wards of Chicago. The health question was one that I went into deeply, and I think I can say justly that through my initiative in that matter and through the cooperation of the State board of health of Illinois that for the first time in the history of great public works we produced an ideal condition of health.

The CHAIRMAN. Ometepe, which is a little island filled with volcanoes that I think are extinct, in Lake Nicaragua, is referred to by some medical authorities as being a very excellent site for hospitals and for sanitariums.

Mr. COOLEY. I think it undoubtly would be.

The CHAIRMAN. For navigators and sailors?

Mr. COOLEY. I think it undoubtedly would be ideal; anywhere on that western division is a fine country. Up there on the Brito headland, nearly 400 feet above the sea, is an outlook that is magnificent.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe that used to be a place of resort for the coast people?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes; so I understand. I think anywhere around there the health conditions are excellent.

MR. SORSBY AND MR. DONALDSON, OUR CONSULS IN NICARAGUA, TESTIFY.

If we take the picture of Panama as drawn by Capt. Bedfore Pim, Baron Humboldt, and the Panama Canal Commission, and set it beside that drawn by General Alexander and Mr. Cooley, and by Consuls Sorsby and Donaldson, and if we could resolve every question in favor of Panama, except that of health, humanity would forbid us from priceing that priceless blessing at $5,630,704 and choosing a country always subject to the ravages of sickness for the use of millions of people in preference to a beautiful and healthful canal route through Nicaragua. Consul Donaldson has resided at Managua, in Nicaragua, since 1895. He went there with the Ludlow Commission as an engineer.

These depositions were taken in June, 1900. They are of great importance and can not be abbreviated so as to present a correct view of the facts stated in them. A few facts from each will show their knowledge of the healthfulness of Nicaragua. Mr. Donaldson says:

Q. I suppose your travels with the engineering parties you accompanied through the San Juan region have given you an opportunity to be stricken with any of the diseases of that country?

A. Yes; I have had plenty of opportunities. I have slept in all sorts of places.

Q. Slept in wet clothes?

A. I will not say I slept in wet clothes, because I always carried a bundle wrapped in rubber, so that I could have something dry to wear for the night. I have gone all day in wet clothes, have put on wet clothes in the morning, and have done so for months at a time; but at night I have always had dry pajamas to get into and a dry blanket, which I kept rolled up in a rubber sack.

Q. That was during your engineering work?

A. Yes.

Q. Were any of your party troubled with malaria or chills?

A. Nobody in our party had any sickness at all. We had 10 Americans in the party, besides natives.

Q. Taking Nicaragua from ocean to ocean, would you be willing to say that it is a healthful or an unhealthful country?

A. I should say that the country is perfectly healthful. The only unhealthful places are the cities, and that is owing to their filthy conditions.

Q. You have a family of children?

A. I have three children.

Q. And they have been brought up in that country?

A. They have been in better health in that country than when they were in New York. My youngest little girl in this country had a bronchial trouble after she had had the whooping cough in New York at the age of 3, and naturally I felt somewhat anxious about taking her to Nicaragua. But she has come back to New York and is to-day one of the strongest little girls you ever saw—at the age of 8 now.

Q. Taking Nicaragua from ocean to ocean, through and through, you would say, I suppose, that it would be a very valuable country in the hands of people who had any industry and thrift?

A. Yes. By nature it is a rich country and perfectly healthful. There is nothing under the sun they need there but industry. It would make a fine country to live in.

Q. For small farmers, particularly?

A. Yes. You can get a splendid climate there by going up 2,000 feet, where you would not suffer from heat at all. It is only in the low country where you suffer. I have suffered much more in New York from heat than I ever have in Managua. There is nothing the matter with the country; there is nothing the matter with the climate; the whole difficulty lies with the people. They are too easy-going; they take life very easily.

Mr. Sorsby, who has resided at Grey Town since 1898, says:

Senator MORGAN. Are the lands in the valley of the San Juan River valuable—I mean for agricultural purposes and timber?

Mr. SORSBY. They are, beginning at about 6 or 7 miles up the river from Grey Town.

Senator MORGAN. And extending up to the lake?

Mr. SORSBY. Yes, sir; except immediately on the bank above Castillo.

Senator MORGAN. If a ship canal were constructed through that country would it add to the value of those lands?

Mr. SORSBY. It would add enormously to the value of the lands from about that distance up.

Senator MORGAN. What are the chief agricultural and horticultural productions of that country?

Mr. SORSBY. The chief production at present on the river is cacao, and there is a great deal of rubber brought out from there. There are several rubber plantations planted there. There are several cattle ranches along the river. There are some bananas planted; not much, though it is considered excellent for bananas. There is none grown there now, because of the difficulty of handling them, of shipping over the bar. The woods, the timbers, higher up the river are considered fine and good.

Senator MORGAN. What kind of timber is it?

Mr. SORSBY. I have seen various kind of hard wood.

Senator MORGAN. Mahogany?

Mr. SORSBY. No, sir; I have not seen any mahogany there. Up the river, near the lake, there is quite a lot of cedar, red cedar, and several varieties of cedar. There are various kinds of hard woods in there that I do not know the names of.

Senator MORGAN. Is it a coffee country?

Mr. SORSBY. No, sir. Between the lake and Grey Town and near the line of the proposed canal, or near the line of the river, it is not considered a coffee country. The elevation is too low.

Senator MORGAN. Is it a sugar country?

Mr. SORSBY. Yes, sir; I think the soil and climate admirable for the cultivation of sugar cane.

Senator MORGAN. Rice?

Mr. SORSBY. Yes, sir; sugar, rice, fruits, and vegetables of all kinds.

Senator MORGAN. Indian corn?

Mr. SORSBY. I doubt that Indian corn would grow very well in any part of the country.

Senator MORGAN. Is it a good cattle country?

Mr. SORSBY. Yes, sir; a good cattle country.

Senator MORGAN. Does it appear to be a well-watered country?

Mr. SORSBY. Yes, sir.

Senator MORGAN. How about the health of that region between the lake and the seaboard?

Mr. SORSBY. I can only answer that by referring to the men employed by the Nicaragua Canal Commission.

Senator MORGAN. Have no people settled in that region?

Mr. SORSBY. There are some settlements immediately on the river banks and up the various rivers emptying into the San Juan River.

Senator MORGAN. Leading into, you mean?

Mr. SORSBY. Leading into the San Juan River. I have seen a great many of those people—some foreigners are in there—living on the San Carlos and various other rivers leading into the San Juan River, and the universal expression is that it is healthy.

Senator MORGAN. Is there any yellow fever or Chagres fever in that country?

Mr. SORSBY. There is no yellow fever in any part of Nicaragua.

Senator MORGAN. Is there any Chagres fever?

Mr. SORSBY. No, sir; nothing that resembles either yellow or Chagres fever on the Atlantic side. There is no yellow fever in any part of Nicaragua, though at Granada and Managua they have malarial fevers. They are quite prevalent during what is known as the dry season up there.

Senator MORGAN. That is on the lake?

Mr. SORSBY. Yes, sir; on the two lakes. It is attributed to the bad sanitary conditions and the water that is used.

Senator MORGAN. If I understand you correctly, the valley of the San Juan River is very sparsely inhabited?

Mr. SORSBY. Yes, sir.

Senator MORGAN. Is the forest heavy?

Mr. SORSBY. The undergrowth is very heavy.

Senator MORGAN. Almost impenetrable?

Mr. SORSBY. Yes, sir.

Senator MORGAN. What is the effect of the rainfall in that part of Nicaragua upon the health and comfort of those living in that region?

Mr. SORSBY. I think it is beneficial to health. It is inconvenient. It has the effect of keeping fresh water in all the lagoons there. The engineers of the canal commission tell me that they drank their water out of the lagoons and streams, and it was good. In Greytown it serves to freshen the atmosphere, and there is very little sickness during the rainy system.

Senator MORGAN. I gather from your statement, then, that the rainfall there would neither be deleterious to the health of the country nor to the construction or preservation of such a work as a canal with embankments?

Mr. SORSBY. It certainly would not affect the preservation, judging from the indication shown by the work that has been done there. It might be inconvenient. Constant rainfall would naturally be inconvenient to a day laborer. It is considered there that that is the healthiest part of the year in Greytown and vicinity.

I thought these features of the case of sufficient importance to require that the facts should be presented in some detail.

Under the health conditions as they are and will remain it seems impossible that the United States can furnish the money and take the risk of the sacrifice of lives that are necessary to purchase and complete the canal at Panama.

POLICE POWERS NECESSARY IN SANITATION.

Connected with the health conditions at Panama, in such a way that it is inseparable, is the question of police jurisdiction and control of the bays of Colon and Panama, and of these cities. A joint control of these places is indispensable to sanitation and the preservation of the peace.

A mixed or joint control is incongruous, irritating, and dangerous. In fact, it is utterly inadmissible.

The city of Panama is the capital of a State of Panama, and lies within less than 3 miles of the Panama Canal; and the Panama Railroad enters the city.

It can not be reasonably expected that the powers of local government vested in that State and necessary for the control of its capital city, whatever they may be, will be yielded to the United States in whole or in part; or, if that should occur, that we could expect to use them with such vigor and so exclusively as is necessary in sanitation and quarantine.

In all our efforts to repress the contagion of yellow fever the highest powers of government, both State and Federal, have been necessarily resorted to, and even these have been frequently ineffectual to prevent bands of private persons from armed interference with the regulations established by law.

Personal liberty, in its most personal and individual sense, is always involved in the execution of health regulations, and such occasions require the exertion of the most direct and arbitrary authority, backed by force in frequent instances.

It will be in vain that we will hope to control or suppress yellow fever or the bubonic plague, cholera, beri-beri, or leprosy, to all of which Panama is at all times exposed, when either Panama or Colombia is to be allowed a voice in the regulations we must adopt, or in the selection and control of the men who are to enforce them. It is sheer folly to undertake such a conflict as is required to suppress yellow fever with forces divided and alien to each other, in the midst of a mixed throng of low-grade people.

The control of the trade and intercourse between Colon and Panama, the State capital, and Carthagena, the commercial capital, and Bogota, the political capital of Colombia, by the concessionaires of a canal, except by force or by some special agreement, is impossible. The people of those places will not tolerate sanitary regulations that will prevent their free intercourse. The importance of this exclusive control of sanitation is greatly magnified when we attempt to apply the necessary regulations, at all times and without relaxation, as they must be applied to the occupants of Panama City and to the intercourse of the people of all nations through this highway of the world.

If the regulations are not of absolute authority and strictly and continually enforced, the canal will become an artery for the dissemination of diseases through the world.

WHY WE ARE AGAIN IN PANAMA WITH WAR SHIPS.

In 1846 we entered into a treaty agreement with New Granada—now Colombia—to guarantee the sovereignty of that Republic over the State of Panama. The consideration for this agreement, as it was expressed in the treaty, was of little value as compared with the burden of this engagement, which has proven to be serious and is now a source of expense, anxiety, and trouble to us. The real consideration was that our duty of protection was exclusive and carried with it the right to admit or refuse other nations to assume a like close relation with Colombia. This became manifest when Great Britain and France, on the suggestion of Colombia, sought to share with the United States these burdens and obligations, which we refused; and so the matter stands to-day.

In 1846 Colombia had a single purpose in making that treaty, which was, with our assistance, to hold the State of Panama subject to her sovereign dominion. The same cause exists to-day, and the danger against which Colombia was providing is greater than it was in 1846, and for stronger reasons. The cause is that Panama has always been averse to the union with Colombia, preferring independence or a union with the other isthmian States. They have no patriotic sentiment and no identity of business relations to support the union with the continental States of Colombia. Constant jealousy has, on four occasions, broken out into open wars of insurrection since 1846.

There have been and are still internecine wars, and are all political in character. Holding Panama in the leash bound to Colombia, as we have been compelled to do and are now doing, we incur the natural resentment of those people, nearly all of whose possessions of any real value are at the canal terminals or near to its line.

AN UNFRIENDLY PEOPLE IN PANAMA.

If we acquire control of those people, along with the bays, the cities, the railroad, and the canal, we will encounter the serious difficulty of using and operating them among an unfriendly people.

Power alone can not be relied upon to protect a canal under such conditions, and the task is full of dangers, especially where the country is already occupied by insubordinate and revolutionary elements. We may get along without it, but the experiment is very costly at the price of $5,630,704, with an additional stipend to be paid to Colombia. Panama must be paid at least the $25,000 per annum, secured to her in the railroad concession, for more than sixty years to come, or for all time, if the lease is to be made perpetual, because she holds that right against the railroad company under and as part of the concession of Colombia to the Panama Railroad, which has been enacted as a public statute by the Colombian Congress.

When Panama shall hereafter seek to increase her allowance as the price of peace and good conduct toward the canal, as she certainly will, we will naturally expect trouble.

THERE IS NO ADVERSE CONDITION IN NICARAGUA OR COSTA RICA.

These political, sanitary, police, and social conditions are quite the reverse on the Nicaragua route. There we have no natural causes of epidemic diseases to remove, and yellow fever has never been a visitor to the region in which the canal is located. It is a salubrious country, constantly fanned by the trade winds, with a temperature that varies only 30 degrees, between 56 and 96 Fahrenheit, with a lake system, 45 miles across and 140 miles long, in the center of the land, over which these winds move without obstruction.

The island of Ometepe, in Lake Nicaragua, has been selected by the common judgment of travelers as a sanitarium for seamen who will pass it on their long and weary voyages. The beautiful country is a place of refreshment for all voyagers, abounding in excellent fruits and supplies of fresh foods. The lake can be conveniently utilized for the repairs of vessels, even to the cleansing of the bottoms from the accumulation of sea grasses and barnacles that lower their speed while they are en voyage passing through its fresh waters.

But a much greater advantage as to sanitation and police is the fact that this fertile country is practically unoccupied, and, under our control, the future occupants will be subject to our selection. Bad characters can not congregate in the canal belt or in the ports, if we object. In Panama this vital question is one of expulsion. In Nicaragua it is a question of our permission. The difference is wide enough and sufficiently important to make it fundamental in the choice of a canal route.

At Panama it is a question of purging out the bad characters found in a low-grade population of 30,000 in a district of 35 miles.

At Nicaragua the question is whether we will tolerate bad men, or demoralizing occupations, in the building up of the cities, towns, and farms in the canal belt, which has not more than 2,000 inhabitants in a distance of 183 miles.

There is no economic question connected with the future management of the canal of more importance than that of peopling the canal belt and the terminal cities with proper occupants.

I am only touching the outline of all these vital questions, leaving the further and better discussions of their merits to others.

THE POLITICAL COOPERATION OF THREE REPUBLICS.

It is a political situation of great moment, and it is a cause of sincere gratification to the three Republics concerned in this canal that their interests are unified and not discordant, as the interests of the State of Panama are toward those of Colombia.

Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and the United States, if they unite in establishing this canal by agreement, are not seeking profits from its earnings, but from the general prosperity it will bring to the Governments and the people of the three Republics. No local dissension can arise in either Republic to question its sovereign power to enter into or to keep the compact, such as may arise in Panama.

The maintainance, safety, and prosperity of the canal is so identified with the growth and solidarity of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, from which it is inseparable, that they will gladly contribute all their governmental and moral power to its support and protection. They will both be jealous for the safety and prosperity of the canal, with no cause for jealousy toward each other as to ownership or control, and the United States will be bound to both in every bond of regard and sympathy and by the great and overruling necessity of shortening the distance between all our Eastern ports on the Great Lakes, the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico, and our ports and possessions along the coast and in the islands of the Pacific Ocean.

There seems to be no room for disagreement in future, when our mutual interests are common to each Republic, and are entirely separated from competition with each other. Such accord and concurrence in the establishment of this great benefaction to mankind is a new and splendid proof of the unity and harmony of principle that exists in the spirit and purpose of republican government.

TRANSPORTATION IN SAILING SHIPS.

A greater question than any I have tried to present, so far as it affects the commerce of the United States and the prosperity of those who create commerce by production, manufactures, and transportation, is directly presented in the proposition to purchase and complete the Panama Canal.

That question is, whether vessels propelled by sail will be driven from the ocean trade and ultimately from existence, by vessels propelled by steam. This prediction is urged by the Panamists as an inevitable fact. It is a prophecy of evil to mankind, which Congress is asked to assist in fulfilling speedily. If it is a prophecy like that which chained the blinded Sampson to the pillars of the temple, the result will be equally destructive to all.

It is a disturbing thought and a distressing forecast, that the alleged rapid progress of civilization, through commercial expansion, requires that we should discard the ocean winds that have built up commerce from its cradle.

It is neither commercial wisdom nor common sense that would cause the world to dispense with this incalculable power of the ocean winds in propelling vessels, that is the free gift of the Creator, and is always ready for use, to take up steam as the motive power of ships of commerce only for the reason that time is saved in making voyages.

The saying that "time is money," which alone accounts for this attempted destructive revolution in commercial economics, means that money and credit are to supplant the benevolence of the All-wise Creator in conferring this blessing upon all the generations of men.

That condition has not been reached and we will not witness the day of its arrival. Our effort to hasten it will fail. May God protect the people of the United States and of the world against that day.

I have less dread of its realization because the prophets of this evil are driven to this course of reasoning by the weight of the fact that the calm belt off the bay of Panama is impracticable for the profitable employment of sailing vessels. It is an absurd theory, adopted as the only escape from a fatal dilemma. If "the wish is not father to the thought," the thought at least is not disturbing to the advocates of the Panama route. They accept it as a decree of fate, with philosophic indifference to the result. They openly avow that the Panama Canal is to be completed without any reference whatever to the interests or advantages of the owners and navigators of sailing vessels or any losses they may sustain through the assistance of Congress to increase competitive advantages of vessels propelled by steam.

THE ISSUE IS SQUARELY MADE AND THIS CONGRESS WILL DECIDE IT ON THIS BILL.

No more reckless an attitude was ever taken with reference to an economic question, or with less benevolence, reason, or justice to support it. But by confession of the advocates of the Panama route, boldly stated, and by the pressure of facts that can not be controverted or avoided the issue is squarely made and must be met.

Since the era in which Job spoke of those "that go down to the sea in ships," the winds have been as necessary to sea travel and commerce as the rains have been to the productions of the soil, and it is as likely that men and animals will abandon the brooks and springs and take to hot drinks as it is that steam will supplant the winds in the movement of ships.

Steam represents the mechanical force of expansion, caused by heat operating upon water, while the winds represent that force, combined with the force of gravitation, operating upon the air, a highly elastic agent. Through these qualities the winds transport themselves to the places where they are needed for commerce, by the action of natural laws, and they are unfailing in supply and in volume and power. They are almost, if not quite as certain as "the stars in their courses," and require no preparation of human labor or skill to prepare them for their work, or to marshal them in their constant array to answer the calls of the Master, who directs the breezes and rules and guides the tempests.

The winds are not dug from the deep mines under the mountains and transported on railroads to the seaboard as coals are, and they require no human help to cross the seas to some coaling station, again to be handled and transferred to coal bunkers, and again handled in furnace rooms of ships under the severest exactions upon human health and strength. The winds, once used, return to the places where they were found, awaiting the service of man, with all their vigor and elastic force. But coals, when once they are used to generate power, disappear and can not be recreated. They create a vacuum in earth and air that they can not restore.

Comparing these forces, a child should understand the imperishable nature and value of the winds, and be able to contrast them with the perishable forces generated from coal, which consume themselves in the use. If the winds did not come to the aid of coal, to transport it to the points where it is to be used in steamships, the percentage consumed in this transportation, like an eating cancer, would soon destroy the body that supports it.

Africa, South America, the Pacific coasts of Russia and North America, and the vast area of southern Asia are so scantily supplied with coal that the commerce of those regions could not be transported by the power of steam that they could supply during a period of even a half century. The rapid-transit commerce of those regions, which only includes such commodities as can bear the burden of heavy freight rates, is transported in steamers that burn coals from Germany, the United Kingdom, Australia, and the United States. The coal supply of the Eastern Hemisphere begins to fall away, and all Europe, including Germany and Great Britain, are beginning to import coals from America.

That fact strikes the vain notion dead, that steamships will ever drive sailing ships from the oceans. This fact is exemplified in the lists of steamships and sailing ships built in the United States in 1901, which I will append to my remarks.

On the contrary, the cost of steam transportation, as it affects commerce in the coarser and cheaper articles of traffic, is so burdensome to countries that have scant supplies of coal that France is granting heavy subsidies to sailing vessels, with the effect of a rapid growth of such tonnage under her flag within the past five years, and Norway-Sweden is rapidly increasing her merchant sailing fleet.

THE INCREASE OF STEAMSHIPS.

After the opening of the Suez Canal in 1871 there was a rapid increase in the number and tonnage of steamships for ocean service, in which Great Britain led all other countries and began by pouring subsidies into their coffers.

This movement was in pursuance of a great and necessary national policy of Great Britain far more than as a result of any legitimate commercial demand for rapid or cheap transportation. Great Britain had her Pacific possessions to guard and care for. She had Egypt and South Africa to look after, and the trade of India to continue to hold in the grasp of monopoly. She had Russia to exclude from the Mediterranean, and France, Italy, Germany, Spain, and Portugal to compete with for the traffic of the Orient.

There were no winds in the Red Sea to move sailing ships, and there were dangerous winds in the Indian Ocean and fitful winds in the Mediterranean that rendered sailing ships useless on the Suez Canal route. She purchased the stock of the Khedive in the canal en bloc, and, while it was not the majority of the stock of the canal company, it enabled her to put her directors in that company, which she did. And by repressive influences of a diplomatic sort she strangled the possible competition of an American isthmian waterway, while she was reaping great profits from her Suez Canal stock and was forcing new channels of trade through the Pacific Ocean.

It was not that she abandoned her long-settled policy of building sailing ships as the burden bearers of commerce, but because she needed more steamships for emergent service to work the Suez Canal and to maintain her supremacy on the sea.

The proof of this is clear when the rapid and great increase of sailing-ship tonnage to Australia and around the Cape of Good Hope is considered.

In 1884 vessels aggregating 1,565,649 tons entered and cleared at the Cape of Good Hope. In the year 1898 this tonnage amounted to 5,602,955, a fivefold increase in fourteen years. The proportion of sailing ships in this increased tonnage was greater than it was before the Suez Canal was opened. It was the Suez Canal fleet of steamers that she so rapidly increased with the stimulus of subsidies, while her sailing ships increased without such aids.

AMERICAN VESSELS AND THEIR TONNAGE.

On page 1146 of the Hearings Professor Johnson gives the tonnage of registered American vessels as follows:

Steamers, 1,183,000 tons; sailing vessels, 1,360,000 tons, showing an excess of 177,000 tons in favor of sailing ships. Having reached this safe equilibrium, the sailing-ship construction is resuming its activity and is steadily growing. It does not grow so rapidly as steamships in tonnage, but more rapidly in the number of vessels.

Ships enrolled for the coastwise trade are not included in the above statement, and the professor states that three-fifths of the coastwise trade is conducted in sailing ships.

It is needless to speculate how or why these conditions have occurred. They are actual and existing conditions, established by actual computations in figures. They certainly do not justify adverse prophecies as to their ultimate disappearance.

The proposition to create a canal by drawing on the treasury of the people, and to locate it where sailing ships can not use it, because of the calm belt into which its Pacific terminus opens, thereby depriving more than half the tonnage of the United States of all advantage from it, is simply monstrous, when taken by itself.

It is grievously unjust when it drives sailing ships, built on either coast, from access to the other, even around Cape Horn, in profitable voyages, by giving to steamships the advantage of more than 10,000 miles in distance in passing to and from the North Atlantic and North Pacific, and by shutting them off from such opportunity it is unjust to all commercial men and to all producers and manufacturers by destroying more than one-half the competition beween water transportation and railroad transportation on commodities that find their interchangeable markets on our sea coasts, lake shores, and gulf coasts from Sitka around to Duluth.

It is ruinous to individual enterprise in the building, owning, and navigating sailing ships, by turning over the whole business of ocean transportation to the owners of costly steamer lines, and putting the commercial dominion of the seas in the hands of corporate trusts, and of the combines of the sceptered masters of finance and credit who are called capitalists.

There is no American need of such exclusive privileges, and it is sheer spoliation to tax the people to the extent of $180,000,000 in this generation to construct the canal and in all coming generations to make them pay tolls on their productions to support such privileged classes, while they will gather harvests of gold from their labors.

I pass by the contracts of the Panama Railroad with other lines of transports now existing and have in the recent past extorted hundreds of millions of dollars from producers, chiefly from the people of the Pacific slope, to which agreements the United States will become a party when it buys the Panama Railroad, with the consent of New York. As compared with the destruction of our sailing ships that we would surely visit upon them in purchasing and completing the Panama Canal, this is even a smaller matter than the inheritance of the Panama scandals, which will stink in the nostrils of all men who live and all who shall follow us.

When the era of destruction has overtaken the sailing ships, which is so flippantly predicted by our economic soothsayers, then, also, will come the era of lockouts and strikes in the coal mines of the leading producers of "sea power," and commerce will be brought to a standstill, a dead center, in all the seaports of the world. Labor may then have its dire revenge upon capital, unless armies are interposed to compel miners to work, to produce coal to propel the ships of war and commerce.

I can think of no more helpless state in which the world's commerce would be found than the realization of these dreams of our learned pundits, who so confidently and with such a smiling air of hope look forward to the abolishment of sailing ships as inconvenient tools of trade.

I would then be hopeless of relief through even the magical skill of the associated peace arbitrators, who now promise a great remedy for a very slight attack of this annual visitation of lockouts and strikes. If the world is to be destroyed by fire in the end of all things, I would dread the destruction of the sailing ship by the fires of the steamers as the beginning of the end.

THE VALUE OF A DAY IN THE VOYAGE BETWEEN OUR ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC COASTS.

If steamers are so essential to the speed of commercial intercourse, or if the emergencies of war demand the shortest line and the quickest voyage for our armed fleets for their rapid concentration, the advantage of a day may be vital to the country in the one case or to the merchant in the other. And the cost of even a day's voyage, when applied to 1,000 ships through an indefinite reach of time, will be a loss of incalculable sums to the persons or the government that owns the ships.

Ascertained facts, as to which there is no real controversy, demonstrate the assertion that on a round trip between ports of the North Atlantic and the North Pacific oceans there is an actual loss of not less than three days, or seventy-two hours, between the voyages of steamers that will pass through a canal at Panama as compared with the same steamers on voyages to and from the same ports passing through the canal at Nicaragua.

This is a vital point in the economic question involved in the choice of routes, and it is due to its importance that it should be established in a satisfactory manner.

If we will strain our thoughts up to the conception of the actual loss of time and money that will fall upon the owners of steam vessels that will pass through an isthmian canal in a hundred years, which is the shortest period for any proposed lease of canal privileges, and if we will add to it the loss that will fall upon the owners of cargoes, we will find that the route which is shortest by three days would be the cheapest to the American people if it cost $500,000,000 more than the longer route, and that $5,630,704 saved in the proposed bargain would not pay the interest on that sum for a single year.

Sailing ships, in this connection, being entirely excluded from consideration, the sailing distances for steamers between the same terminals of a voyage through the respective routes and the speed of the same vessels, as it is effected by the tides on each coast and the length and the curvature of each canal, and the advantages of speed derived from a voyage through fresh water, are the factors that decide this important economic question.

THE VOYAGE OF THE OREGON.

These points are conclusively established by the testimony in favor of the Nicaraguan route. The dimensions of the ship selected by the witnesses for the test is 5,000 tons' burden, and the normal rate of speed is 10 knots an hour, or 250 miles per day. The distance, computed between Key West, which is an average central point on the Atlantic and Gulf coast, and San Francisco, our chief mart of trade on the Pacific, is shown in the following official statement of the Navy Department as to the voyage of the Oregon during the war with Spain. This distance is 3,665 knots by the Nicaragua route, measured by the shortest practicable line of navigation, and 3,750 knots measured by "a route that avoids all shoal water and is absolutely safe for navigating battle ships."

By the Panama route the distance is 4,363 knots, and the difference in distance is 613 knots in favor of Nicaragua by the route that is absolutely safe for battle ships, and 965 knots by a route that is practicable for battle ships and must be entirely safe for 5,000-ton merchant steamers.

But the supreme need for the canal being governmental, in case of national emergency, the distance of 613 knots to the credit of the Nicaragua route is adopted for the further basis of computation as to the saving of distance, time, and money by that route.

The voyage of the Oregon, as it is stated by the Navy Department, with reference to time, distance, and the cost to the Government, is as follows:

MEMORANDUM REGARDING THE PASSAGE OF THE OREGON FROM THE ATLANTIC TO THE PACIFIC.

The U. S. S. Oregon left San Francisco on March 19, 1898, with 1,567.4 tons of coal on board. Of this coal, 1,127½ tons had been taken on board in San Francisco, at a cost of $7.95 per ton, and the remaining 439.9 tons had been on board previously, at a cost of $5.50 per ton, making the total value of coal on board $11,112.65 and the average value per ton $7.09.

Coal was received on the trip at Callao, Peru, Sandy Point, Chile, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, and Barbados, West Indies, and the vessel arrived at Key West with 251.8 tons of the coal originally on board at San Francisco.

In regard to the cost of the trip through either the Nicaraguan or Panama canal, the following distances were furnished by the Hydrographic Office, Navy Department:

	Knots.
San Francisco to Brito (west end of Nicaragua Canal)	2,700
Jan Juan del Norte to Key West	965
San Francisco to Panama	3,277
Colon to Key West	1,086

The following table shows the cost of coal for the trip in making the passage to Key West from San Francisco by the Nicaraguan and Panama canals, based on the knots per ton of coal and cost of coal taken on board in San Francisco, which coal would have been enough in either case to make the entire trip:

	Nicaragua Canal.			Panama Canal.
	Distance.	Coal.	Coal, cost.	Distance.	Coal.	Coal, cost.
	Miles.	Tons.		Miles.	Tons.
San Francisco to end of canal	2,700	651.7	$4,620.00	3,277	791	$5,608.19
Through canal	170	41	290.69	50	12.1	85.79
From eastern end of canal to Key West	965	232.9	1,651.26	1,068	257.8	1,827.80
Total	3,835	925.6	6,562.16	4,395	1,060.9	7,521.78
Delays at 15 tons per day		45	319.05		30	212.70
Coal remaining on board at end of trip		956.8			476.5
Saving in cost of fuel by going through the canal			43.385			42.433

The cost of sending the Oregon around the Horn from San Francisco to Key West was as follows:

Coal	$50,266
Pay of officers and crew, rations, etc	42,411
Stores (except coal and ordnance stores)	4,870
Total	97,547

Actual time taken to make the trip through the straits, sixty-eight days. Average speed with coal taken in San Francisco, per day, 260 knots.

	Days.
Time by Nicaraguan Canal (including delay of three days getting through canal)	17
Time by Panama Canal (including two days delay getting through canal)	19
Total saving in time by Nicaragua Canal	51
Total saving in time by Panama Canal	49

NOTE.—The distance herein given of 965 knots from San Juan del Norte (Greytown) to Key West is the shortest practicable distance, while that furnished by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of 1,055 knots for the same route is longer by reason of a route being chosen which avoids all shoal water and is absolutely safe for navigating battle ships.

The other witnesses—Professor Haupt, Mr. Cooley, Captain Miller, Mr. Noble—and the report of Lieutenant Sullivan, all substantially agree as to these sailing distances by the two routes; but the foregoing statement from the Navy Department settles the matter beyond reasonable controversy.

Taking the distances thus ascertained, and one-half the coal consumption as the ratio for a merchant steamer of 5,000 tons, and the time saved at the average of four days on a round-trip voyage, and the loss by the Panama route in the item of coal consumption is as follows:

The per diem coal consumption on a ship of $5,000 tons	$37.61
For four days, on each round trip	150.44
On five ships of 5,000 tons, each day it is	752.20
For a year it is for the single item of coal	274,553.00

Interest, insurance, depreciation, wages, and supplies, and interest and insurance on cargo, if they are estimated only at an equal cost, increases the loss on five ships per day to $1,508.40, and per annum to $550,566, and for ten years to $5,505,660.

These estimates are on a less tonnage than passes through the Suez Canal, and on about one-third of the tonnage that passes through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal annually.

Instances that prove these facts are multiplied in the testimony of the witnesses, but these figures, taken from the voyage of the Oregon, are a demonstration, and I prefer to adopt them as the basis of my verdict.

THE LOSS OF MONEY TO SAILING SHIPS.

As to the loss of time on sailing ships, it is not necessary to make a calculation to compare these two routes, since the advocates of the Panama route dismiss them from all calculations "as unconsidered trifles." If we should still venture a plan, that sailing ships shall not be destroyed by excathedra declarations of their enemies, but shall have at least the opportunity to visit the great oceans through Nicaragua, where favoring winds from the heavens invite them continually, we can support that plan out of the mouths of the enemies of this great industry.

The subject has been most carefully examined by that greatest of the geographers of the seas, Mathew F. Maury, who ranks as a great admiral amongst all sailors, but was only a lieutenant and chief of the National Observatory in the old Navy, from which he resigned.

Under the orders of the Government, this subject has been carefully reexamined by Lieutenant Sullivan, and for many years it has been under the close observation of the Hydrographic Office of the Navy Department. The sailing directions of the Bureau of Navigation are in evidence on the hearings; the testimony of Captain Bryan, Captain Miller, Commander Young, and others, detailing their personal observations, and the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission show, beyond dispute, that the calm belt off the Bay of Panama forbids commerce to seek the Northern Pacific Ocean through the Panama Canal, while the strong and steady trade winds blow across Nicaragua at Grey Town and Brito, and continue constantly and without interruption across the Pacific to the coast of China.

Between Panama and San Francisco the average loss of time for a sailing vessel is fifteen days one way, and frequently it is more than two months. Putting the loss of time for a sailing ship of 5,000 tons at one-half the sum it will cost a steamer, the loss in money for thirty days on a round trip, or $75 per diem, will be $2,250 on each voyage out and in. What the loss will be to the whole country through the exclusion of sailing ships from the advantages of an isthmian canal I will leave to the computation of those who have the courage to face that disastrous situation.

THE CURVATURE OF THE TWO ROUTES.

The curves on the canal line on the Nicaragua route are for the much greater part in the section occupied by the San Juan River, where the washing of the canal banks by the waves from vessels will do no possible harm and will constantly improve the channel.

The following statement from the bureau of inquiry, furnished by the great navigator, Rear-Admiral George W. Melville, utterly dissipates the contention that the curvatures of the canal as located by the Isthmian Canal Commission is either dangerous to ships or that they will reduce the speed to a minimum rate.

It would seem very sad if that Commission in their plan had so arranged it that the greatest ships could not safely pass through it with their own steam. But the following paper proves that they have made ample provision for even high speed:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 31, 1902.

DEAR SENATOR: Answering your letter about permissible speed of ships around curves, I have gotten out the following for you, which with pleasure I now transmit:

A twin-screw ship can, on her own steam, round a curve of any radius down to one of less than her own length by the expedient of going ahead with one screw and backing with the other; her speed, meantime, will of necessity be very small, or even backward, depending on the relative speeds of the two screws.

With both engines going ahead under equal steam, the sharpest turns that can be followed by means of the rudder alone will be:

Name.	Draft.	Displacement.	Speed.	Radius.
	Feet.	Tons.	Knots.	Feet.
Brooklyn	22	9,215	6	1,113
			9	1,012
			10	918
Oregon:
Port helm	26	11,460	10	480
Starboard helm	26	11,460	10	435
Indiana	24	10,225	6	592

The speeds given in the table are those of actual trials. At other speeds the minimum radius would not be very different, and the maximum speed at which such a short curve would be attempted would be limited only by the tendency of the vessel to heel over, a limitation which, however, is never approached in a vessel having reasonable stability.

All of the above applies to the conditions on the open sea.

In a canal the greatest permissible speed, whether on a curve or a straight stretch, is determined by the wear and tear on the banks from the wash of the waves. At a given (wave-making) speed the waves produced in the canal are much larger than on the open sea, and their destructive action, even when the banks are protected by riprap, is such that speeds greater than 6 or 7 knots are practically out of the question.

With best wishes and respect, yours, faithfully,

GEO. W. MELVILLE.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
United States Senate.

THE CLEANSING OF SHIPS' BOTTOMS IN FRESH WATER.

As the opportunity is now directly presented, and the subject is of much importance to commerce and navigation and gives to the Nicaragua Canal route a prominent advantage over the Suez and Panama routes, I will present, without argument, a paper from Rear-Admiral Melville, chief engineer of the Navy, relating to the effect of immersion of ships in fresh water, in clearing their bottoms of sea grass and barnacles after long ocean voyages.

It is a subject of great importance, and it is to be noted that the Nicaragua Canal is the only place where this can be done while the ship is pursuing its voyage. The fresh-water navigation in the Nicaragua Canal extends for 180 miles, while in the Panama Canal it extends no more than 21 miles. If it is true that the submergence of ships in fresh water for a day will kill these parasites, they will soon afterwards drop from the vessel while on its voyage, and the impediment to speed will be removed. It is asserted by Mr. McDonell, who is a close student of such matters, that the real work is done in the submergence of the vessel for twenty-four hours by killing the parasites.

It will be seen from the following letter that our naval authorities attach great importance to this subject in respect of war vessels.

Mr. President, that is quite a lengthly letter, considering the nature of the subject, but it is so very important that Admiral Melville has gone into the subject for the ascertainment of historical facts and calculations. I shall not undertake to delay the Senate by reading the figures, as no Senator could pretend to retain them in his mind; but the advantage of the immersion of a man of war, or, in fact, of any steamer or any sailing ship, in the fresh waters of the Nicaragua Canal over a sailing distance of 180 miles—it is all fresh water in the Nicaragua Canal—in respect of the cleansing of the bottoms of ships of barnacles, seaweeds, and other crustacea, is one of the most important features connected with the whole subject. It looks like a small matter, but still, when we count the loss of speed of ships, particularly battle ships and cruisers, when speed at times is of such absolute indispensable necessity, we can save to the Government of the United States millions upon millions of dollars by passing those ships through these fresh-water lakes that otherwise would be expended in cleaning the bottoms of ships in dockyards, etc.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING,
Washington, D. C., March 31, 1902.

DEAR SENATOR MORGAN: The efficiency of all vessels is greatly impaired by the foulness of the ships' bottoms. In the days of sail the resulting loss was not so great, for the hulls of the wooden ships were sheathed and therefore barnacles and grasses did not attach themselves so readily to the hull structure. The sheathing of the modern war ship and ocean steamer is practically impossible, and therefore the docking of vessels is necessary about twice a year.

The fouling of ships' bottoms depends on the time spent in cruising, the waters in which the cruise is made, and the service performed.

The loss of speed and the corresponding increase in coal consumption due from the fouling of the hull are matters that vitally concern the shipowner. As for men-of-war, the subject is of greater moment, since one of the most important factors in determining the usefulness and efficiency of the war ship is the question of radius of action, or the distance that the vessel is able to steam without coaling.

The following data will show how seriously a foul hull will interfere with the efficiency of the war ship. This data is taken from official records and has been compiled with exceeding care, since it is necessary that the Department secure absolutely correct information upon the subject.

Oregon, 10,000 tons displacement.

	Knots.
1. One-half month out of dock, speed	11.42
2. Two and a half months later, having been under way at a speed of 11 or 12 knots almost continuously (three months out of dock)	11.17
3. Three months later, having been on blockade and in tropical waters three months (six months out of dock)	9.6

The same horsepower, practically, was developed and the same conditions obtained in all three of these runs.

The loss of speed, then, in two and a half months, with the vessel under way almost continuously, was 0.25 knots, while after three months more, with the vessel on blockade and in tropical waters, the loss of speed was 1.5 knots.

Philadelphia, 4,225 tons displacement.

	Knots.
1. With half power, clean bottom (1½ months out of dock)	13.22
2. Same power, 3 months later, after having been under way about half the time (4½ months out of dock)	11.9
3. Three-quarter power, 6 months later, after lying in the harbor of Honolulu 6 months (10½ months out of dock)	10.19

These results can not be compared as well as the ones for the Oregon, but the speed of 10.19 knots made with three-quarter power compared with 13.22 knots made with half power shows a loss of speed equivalent to 3.5 knots had the powers been the same.

Detroit, 2,000 tons displacement.

	Knots.
1. On half power, clean bottom	10.28
2. After lying 4½ months in a tropical harbor	7.95

Same power for both runs.

Nashville, 1,371 tons displacement.

	Knots.
1. With clean bottom made	10.26
2. With seven months' cruising in the Philippines, same power	8.46

Celtic, collier, 6,428 tons displacement.

	Knots.
1. One-half month out of dock; trip, Sydney to Manila	10.4
2. Six months out of dock, Manila to Sydney	9.4

Hannibal, collier, 4,291 tons displacement.

	Knots.
1. With clean bottom, Hampton Roads to Ponce, P. R	10.00
2. One and six-tenths months later, Ponce to Hampton Roads, same power	8.82

These results cover a wide range of conditions. The second run of the Oregon shows the least loss of speed (0.25), the vessel having been under way at a comparatively high sustained speed. The greatest loss of speed is shown in the case of the Philadelphia, third run, when the loss of speed was over 3 knots, notwithstanding the fact that three-quarters power was used on the third run and only half power on the first run. (Loss would have been 3.5 knots with the same power.) Under average conditions of cruisings vessels with a sustained speed of 9 to 11 knots lose 1 to 3 knots after six months out of dock. The loss is very much greater than this with vessels lying in tropical ports for a considerable length of time, and less if cruising continuously.

If a vessel is immersed in fresh water, the effect is to clean the bottom of barnacles and sea grasses to some extent. The following data shows a comparison of performances of several vessels before and after having been in fresh water, and their performance with clean bottoms. The conditions and power developed were practically the same for each set of results:

Monterey.

	Knots.
With clean bottom made	10.00
With foul bottom (just before entering the Columbia River)	9.00
After leaving the Columbia River, having been in fresh water for 44 days	9.73

Monadnock.

With clean bottom made	9.5
With foul bottom (just before entering the Columbia River)	7.88
After leaving the Columbia River, having been in fresh water for 14 days	9.01

Scorpion.

This vessel was in the Mississippi River for fifty-seven days. Data for accurate comparisons could not be obtained, as the runs before entering the river and after leaving it were under such different conditions that comparisons were impossible. However, the vessel was eight and one-half months out of dock on entering the river, and after leaving made 11.49 knots on power that would have given 11.6 to 11.7 knots had the bottom been clean. Undoubtedly her condition was greatly improved.

These results show that when vessels with foul bottoms are immersed in fresh water for a considerable length of time the condition of the hull is greatly improved, from two-thirds to three-fourths of the loss of speed being recovered.

The least time spent in fresh water by any of these ships was fourteen days.

Unfortunately there is no data available for shorter periods, and I regret that I am unable to give you any information as to the effect of time on the cleansing of ships immersed in fresh water.

Yours, truly,

GEO. W. MELVILLE,
Engineer in Chief, U. S. Navy.

CLIMATE, TEMPERATURE, AND HEALTH OF THE MIDWAY STATIONS AROUND THE WORLD.

If this advantage meets the anxious expectations of our naval officers and commercial navigators and dry docks are constructed in Lake Nicaragua they will add immensely to the sea power of the United States and will, with other attractive features of the climate and the productions and the sea air blowing across that country make the Nicaragua Canal route so attractive to navigators that those who control that canal route need not fear competition with the Suez Canal and the Red Sea, which is the hottest region of the world accessible to ships. As the midway station of the equatorial zone of navigation around the world, one of the most useful features will be the docks for cleaning and repairing vessels, while the ships' companies will find rest and refreshment after long voyages. It is the only way station where such facilities can be found grouped together. They are far too important to be lightly considered.

PAGE 103 OF THE REPORT.

I will now close this outline statement of this great subject with an inquiry that is not intended as a criticism, but is intended to point out the fact that the statements on page 103 of the final report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, which the hunger of the Panama Canal Company provoked them to snap up as if it had been prepared as a bait, was not considered or prepared by that commission with any such purpose. It was evidently prepared only to satisfy Congress that the offer of the Panama Canal Company to sell its concessions and their belongings for $109,000,000 was too exorbitant, and to dismiss that subject from further consideration.

That commission had no authority under the law to make or to accept any offer of purchase or sale connected with the canal, and they repeatedly so informed M. Hutin, who was the general manager of the Panama Canal Company.

Even the President of the United States had not the authority to make or accept any such offer, under the statute. His express duty was to recommend a route for the acceptance of Congress, after he had employed the commission in ascertaining the facts relating to the practical question, not the diplomatic or political question, of the practicability and feasibility of the respective routes and the material advantages and disadvantages of both routes.

It was the sole and exclusive duty of the President to determine which route he would recommend to the acceptance of Congress. In performing that duty he would necessarily obtain light from sources that were closed against the examination of the Commission and even of Congress, unless he chose to invite Congress into his confidence as the diplomatic head of the Government under the Constitution.

The shrewd traders of the Panama Canal Company having failed for five years to involve the United States in the partial joint ownership of a property that was already wrecked in value and scandalized in character, they found, on page 103 of the report of our Commission, a bed on which its fall could be broken, and they suddenly dropped their price for the wreck all the dizzy distance from $109,000,000 to $40,000,000. The fall was so startling as to shock all observers, but the agile performers discovered the safety net and leaped for it. It was a desperate leap, but they had faith in the reputed American fondness for glittering temptations in the way of bargains. It rests with Congress to say whether they have made any serious miscalculation.

If we would be magnanimous to those who are performing this apparent act of felo de se, let us lend them the money, with Colombia as security, and let them proceed with their costly experiment. If we are ready to accept the inviting bargain, at the expense of their suffering and apparent loss, let us play true to the character and price the property at the sum that it would cost us to reproduce it.

When we have paid Colombia for the privilege of buying the canal and the railroad stock, we will abandon the role of shrewd and heartless dealers, to which character we will be forever doomed in the estimation of the French people, whatever else we may do, and when we pay a percentage of $10 on each share for the railroad stock, the par value of which is $100, we will be written down as dolts. And so, when we pay $2,000,000 for maps, the useful parts of which have been thrust upon us as a donation—if we pay $2,000,000 premium on the maps under the head of "contingencies," we will lose our reputation for shrewd dealing, and will be classed as very common and foolish people who do not know what to do with their money.

REASONS FOR AN EXCHANGE OF MAPS.

If the inducements for cheap bargains are to be a feature of the trade, it would be well to offer them in exchange for their maps our Nicaragua maps, that represent to us a cost of at least $2,000,000. They could be kept for a time of need; which time will surely arrive when the railroads, or the men who are to get the $40,000,000, shall take up Lull's or Menocal's plan and build a cheap slack-water canal for $65,000,000, in combination with Costa Rica and Nicaragua.

Our owners of sailing ships could afford to build such a canal for the accommodation of our coastwise trade. Such an enterprise is no more than Great Britain accomplished with the Suez Canal, after using all its powers short of war to defeat its construction.

That this subject is in the minds of the persons connected with the Panama Canal, is manifest from the statement of General Abbott in his deposition, on pages 838–840.

What our situation would be with a canal between our coast and the Panama Canal when completed by the United States is a subject worthy the attention of thoughtful men. How we could prevent such a situation, under the recognized right of Costa Rica and Nicaragua to build a canal with money borrowed in trans-oceanic countries or in South America or in Mexico and Cuba is a problem that will demand solution whenever we build the Panama Canal, 600 miles away from our coasts.

WHY THE ESTIMATES ON PAGES 101 AND 103 WERE MADE.

It is evident from the report of the Commissioners, on pages 101–103, that the inventory of the assets of the Panama Canal and the railroad stock and its appraisement was intended to convince Congress that the actual value of it to the United States, even when swollen by 30 per cent of contingencies, was far below the estimate of $109,000,000 put on the property by the French appraisement. That appraisement is $19,000,000 greater than the estimate of M. Hutin, made to President McKinley in the letter of January 18, 1899, addressed to him by Mr. Cromwell, general attorney for the Panama Canal Company.

M. Hutin must have had some strong encouragement in America for thus raising the price of this property from $90,000,000, in January, 1899, to $109,000,000 in November, 1900. It must have been this that stimulated him to attack the Isthmian Canal Commission, and especially Admiral Walker, for misleading him, which M. Hutin did in a letter addressed to the Secretary of State, dated November 22, 1901. In this letter M. Hutin exhibits petulance and resentment because his estimates were rejected without discussion, and without the acceptance of an arbitration proposed by him to ascertain these values, for the want of authority to agree to it.

He demanded that Admiral Walker should print their correspondence in his official report to the President, which was done, without any good reason, notwithstanding the fact that M. Hutin has suppressed Admiral Walker's letters of October 22, 1901, to him, which utterly destroyed the ground of his complaint to the President, through his letter to the Secretary of State. (See Report No. 1, Fifty-seventh Congress, p. 127.) This company has not been able to forget the large sums paid to its American committee by the old company for influence, or that it succeeded in tempting a Secretary of the Navy to quit the Cabinet and become its agent and promoter, on a salary of $25,000 per annum, and the audacity of the company is correspondingly aggressive.

WHY THE SUPPOSED COMMITTAL, ON PAGE 103, WAS SEIZED UPON AS AN OFFER OF PURCHASE.

When M. Hutin had delivered this Parthian arrow at Admiral Walker and returned to Paris, the Hepburn bill passed the House of Representatives by a vote wanting only two votes of unanimity, and General Abbott says a panic ensued in the Panama Company.

M. Hutin was deposed and M. Bo was elected general manager of the Panama Canal Company. The price of the property was dropped to the $40,000,000 mark, assumed to have been prepared as an offer of purchase, by the report of the Commission on page 103. Sixty-nine millions of property values was thrown away in the "panic," and the wheels of justice in the French courts revolved rapidly to anticipate results and to confirm the acceptance of the proposed agreements before they were made or accepted by anybody, which provisional arrangements the ocean cable was taxed to send to Washington.

Hot haste was winged with lightning to stop the Senate from passing the bill which had just passed the House of Representatives. The innocent and loose estimates of page 103 of the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission was identified by M. Bo by reference to a single page of that report, when the estimate included two pages, and was seized upon by telegram as a solemn offer of the Government to pay money for property valued at a fixed price, which cash value was increased $4,942,038 by the addition of contingencies.

And Congress is now asked to appropriate this sum to meet the contingency, that our Commission had really undervalued the property in their report of its actual value made to the President. If we accept it, we do so as a glittering success in making a bargain for property that our Commission had greatly undervalued. If we accept what the Commission say, and what the proof shows to be true, we can not do this on account of any just regard for the men who are trying to save themselves at the expense of many thousands of innocent people, who have been grossly defrauded by them.

WHAT THE FACTS STATED IN THE REPORT ACTUALLY SHOW.

The report shows the actual value of the work done in its present condition. It is all excavation and embankment, capable of being estimated in cubic yards at current prices for labor, and there is no other sort of work, so that the calculation is simple and no room is left for contingencies. This sum allowed for contingencies is only less than the whole difference in the cost of the canals by the sum of $291,361, as the same is estimated by the Commissioners.

On page 102 of their report the Commissioners say:

> The concession is of no value to the United States since a new one must be obtained from the Colombian Government in any event. It is the same with the lands, title to which is dependent upon the completion of the canal, and is still to be earned.
> Much of the property is ill adapted to American methods, and all of it is now from thirteen to twenty years old, during which period the improvements of this class of machinery have been such that contractors would generally find it to their advantage to buy entirely new machinery of modern pattern, rather than attempt to use this of an older class, even if it was given to them.
> The same is true of the greater part of the buildings, including all barracks, storehouses, shops, stables, and miscellaneous buildings, and excepting only hospitals and principal administration buildings. The latter would be the subject of special negotiation. They have appeared in the estimate under the head of contingencies. No special allowance is made for them.

All this means that the canal machinery and the buildings, except the hospitals and principal administration buildings, are of no value to the United States, and that those that are of value are included under the estimates for contingencies. Therefore these excepted buildings are to be paid for at the sum of $4,579,005, with 10 per cent on that, $457,900, making a total for houses, $5,036,905. This 10 per cent is said to be "omissions," but there are no omissions of articles to be purchased, for on page 101 there are 11 classes of articles of which a full description, by items, is given in an "inventory furnished to the Commission."

Under the statement of the value of the property made by the Commission, the value of canal excavation is $21,920,386. The value of houses is $5,036,905. The value of maps is $2,000,000. The value of railroad stock is $6,850,000. Total, $35,807,291. Here is a gap of $4,192,709 to be filled by Chagres diversion, $178,187; Gatun diversion, $1,396,456; railroad diversion, $300,000; total, $1,874,642, leaving $2,318,067, for which there is nothing to answer but a bonus or placebo. With $2,000,000 for maps and $2,318,067 for bonus, we have $4,318,067 in this $40,000,000 for which we have nothing of value to show.

This is more than half the sum that Nicaragua asks for perpetual and exclusive canal rights and privileges through the heart of her country. In any light in which these estimates can be viewed they can not be justly regarded as fixing the actual cash value of the property. They were never intended as such, and Congress, if it appropriates this money, should find a more solid basis for the appropriation than this loose and conjectural estimate, made to show the exorbitant price set upon it in the indefinite and incomplete offer of M. Hutin.

If our Commission is to have credit for high diplomatic ability in driving a good bargain with the failing Panama Canal Company, their estimates of the value of the property they purchase, as stated by them in detail, should come nearer to a balance with the round sum of $40,000,000 than the sum of $4,318,067, which is their nearest approximation to a balance, and when this difference is taken into account in estimating the actual cost of completing the Panama Canal as compared with the cost of the Nicaragua Canal, it reduces the difference to $1,312,637.

And it is for this sum we are asked to yield all tolls forever from sailing vessels, half the competition of the canal with the transcontinental railways, 600 miles of shorter lines for our warships, more than 100 miles of voyage in fresh water for ships that are fouled with sea travel, and the speed gained by them by immersion in the river and Lake Nicaragua. And we tax sailing ships with 10,000 miles of sea voyage through cold and dangerous seas around Cape Horn, and steamships with a loss of four days on a round trip between our Atlantic ports, at a cost of $150 per day on a 5,000-ton ship. For this we compel the wheat growers and lumbermen of the great Pacific slope to cross the Pacific to find the markets of Europe, instead of the markets of our Gulf and Atlantic States.

When we have concluded this brilliant bargain we shall find, like poor Richard, that we have paid too dear for our whistle.

THE COST OF MAINTENANCE AND OPERATION OF THE CANALS.

I will allude to the expenses charged to the respective routes for operating expenses and the maintenance of way, to add only a few observations that need to be made.

Under this head there are no items given in the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission as to which a computation can be made in order to test the accuracy of their estimates, or the cost of maintaining and operating any other canal as an approximate criterion.

The cost of maintenance, per mile, of the Suez Canal is $13,000; of the Kiel Canal, $8,600, and of the St. Marys Canal from $46,000 to $60,000 per mile.

The St. Marys Canal is only 1½ miles long and has all the advantages of concentration. At the rate of $1 per ton, its income during the eight months it is open during the year would be more than $30,000,000. It is the force employed in handling the traffic in the open months that costs so heavily.

The basis of these estimates was discussed by the Commission, but it was not given in their final report, because it was not agreed upon. It was produced by Colonel Ernst, on his examination, and is found in his deposition on pages 687 to 698 of the hearings.

The scheme of government is elaborate, even grand, and is quite ample in officials and salaries for the government of a commonwealth. It consists of a supreme board of control, at Washington, and an engineering department, A, with a governor at a salary of $15,000, and the other salaries are correspondingly high for five other departments.

The risk of life in the climate of Panama may excuse this extravagance for that canal, but it is without justification for Nicaragua. The following summary of these items will show the great magnitude of this plan:

THE SALARIES OF FIVE MEMBERS OF THE SUPREME BOARD OF CONTROL AND THEIR SUBORDINATES IS NOT GIVEN.

The law department at Panama is put at $15,300, for providing the legal regimen for 35,000 resident people, while it is put at 18,700 at Nicaragua, where not more than 2,000 people now reside.

The police department is put at $251,100 at Panama, where there are 35,000 unruly people to control, and at $508,300 at Nicaragua, to control a scattered population of 2,000, quite orderly and peaceable people.

The finance department is put at $27,700 at Nicaragua, and $27,300 at Panama. The amount of money to be received in tolls is supposed to be the cause of this discrimination against Nicaragua of $400 in the expenses.

The medical department is made to cost $125,000 at Nicaragua, in a healthy country, and 13 medical officers, 6 stewards, 36 nurses, and 18 laborers are provided, while the total cost of the medical department at Panama is $104,860, with 7 medical officers, 3 stewards, 12 nurses, and 6 laborers at emergency hospitals, and 5 medical officers, 2 stewards, 20 nurses, and 10 laborers at the regular hospital. The difference of $20,620 per annum is made in favor of Panama, where the pestilential character of that region is described as "fever hole" by General Alexander, and is known of all men to be a region where the yellow fever and chagres fever have their habitat, from which they are never absent. It is so in each of the departments of this proposed government, which seems to have been created to form a basis for the calculation of maintaining an isthmian canal and then retired from observation for future use.

THIS STATELY PROGRAM FOR WORKING A CANAL, AS IF IT WAS A KINGDOM, IS RESPONSIBLE FOR THESE TREMENDOUS ESTIMATES OF EXPENSES.

It is in this programme that the idea had its origin that $2,024,174 was required for maintenance and operation of the canal at Panama, and that $3,350,822 is required for the canal at Nicaragua. The difference of $1,326,664 is ample to operate either canal, if we accept the experience at the Suez Canal, the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, or any other canal between great bodies of water.

It is impossible to know or safely to conjecture by what rule or principle the Isthmian Canal Commission fixed the charges of maintenance and operation of the canal at Nicaragua or compared them with those of the Panama Canal. For engineering, police, sanitation, and general contingencies their estimate of the cost of construction of the canal is $31,644,010. This evidently includes all the plant that is needed for these purposes, and for a canal completed and equipped. Then they add other sums for plant, for the maintenance of all the canal purposes, for keeping the canal in good order, and for vessels and other appliances needed for such service.

The contingencies charged to the Nicaragua Canal are $558,470 in this plan of government, and those charged to the Panama Canal are $337,362, a difference of $221,118 annually, while the steam tugs, inspection steamers, dredges, pile drivers, tugs, scows, pilot boats, naphtha launches, canoes, and saddle horses, which in their nature can not be reasonably expected to be resupplied each year, are charged at full cost, which is very great, for each year, as if they would all disappear after a single year of service.

These estimates, which are far too extravagant and are so loosely made, and these salaries and pay rolls, which are very expensive, account in great part for the charge of $3,350,822 to the Nicaragua Canal for maintenance and operation, when the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, in December, 1900, said in an official bulletin of that date:

> There are no locks on the Suez Canal, but the channel is through drifting sand for a great part of its length. The entrance to the harbor of Port Said, on the Mediterranean, intercepts the drift of sand discharged from the Nile and carried along the coast by the easterly current. The navigation in which steamships can make full speed if they chose is longer than the entire length of the Suez Canal. The line of canalization on land at Nicaragua is 53.50 miles, only about half that of the Suez Canal, and only 6 miles longer than the Panama Canal, all of which is artificial canal.
> Suez has 100 miles of navigation through an artificial channel, and Panama has 47 miles, while Nicaragua has 63 miles of artificial channel and 120 miles of river and lake navigation in which there are no locks. On this state of facts it is impossible that any reason can be stated why it should require $18,310 per mile to maintain 183 miles of canal, of which only 63 miles is of actual canalization, when the cost per mile of the Suez Canal is $13,000, and that canal is dug entirely through the desert sands, which blow into it and make constant dredging necessary to keep it open.

That is the official statement of your Government, which knocks the estimate of the canal commissioners into dust. Nobody is responsible for that but your Government.

It is beyond all reason and experience that the more than 100 miles of deep water on the route of the Nicaragua Canal, where there is no lock and where a dredge will never be used, should be charged annually with $1,741,400 for cost of maintenance and operation. It is on this absurd conjecture that this erroneous calculation has been made. When this sum of $1,741,400 is subtracted from the estimate of $3,350,822, made by the commissioners, it still leaves $1,611,422 to be applied to maintenance and operation, which is still more than is expended annually on the Suez Canal for those purposes by the sum of $311,422, which is more than the estimates of the Isthmian Canal Commission for operating and taking care of the locks, with 20 per cent added for contingencies.

The uncertainty of the situation as to the cost of maintenance and operation of the canal, created by this effort to fabricate a great and expensive system for its government and control, has introduced into this subject an element of doubt and confusion of a serious character.

It would not have existed if the commissioners, at the time they made this report, had been confronted with the $40,000,000 proposition of the Panama Canal Company. They then had no doubt that this company was acting sincerely in the statement that $109,000,000 was the sum, below which, they would not sell the ditch, the maps, and the railroad stock, with the right, without objection from them, to purchase new concessions from Colombia; and they had no special reasons for closely estimating the cost of maintaining and operating the canal, as to which there must always be a margin of doubt.

The effort was made, on a plan of great amplitude, to institute a very costly government for the canal, but it failed in committee and was not sent to the President with their report, and it is this abortive scheme that is now presented as the estimate of great engineers, carefully made, as to the difference of the cost of maintainance and operation as between the two routes.

The number and salaries of the official corps, the cost of the plant, to be renewed, annually, and the contingencies, have no actual relation to the experience of governments in respect of other canals. They are arbitrary suggestions, and are not calculations based on facts that are even alluded to as supporting the plan.

The following statements in the deposition of Colonel Ernst sufficiently explain this situation:

> The CHAIRMAN. About what is the population of Panama?
> Colonel ERNST. About 20,000, I think.
> The CHAIRMAN. And about how much in Colon?
> Colonel ERNST. About five or six thousand.
> The CHAIRMAN. Is there any considerable number of French citizens or people located in Panama or Colon permanently?
> Colonel ERNST. Well, I fancy not. Of course, most of the people that we saw were French. They were the officers of the canal company, but I do not think there are many outside of those officials.
> The CHAIRMAN. Are there many French residents in that part of the country, in those cities?
> Colonel ERNST. I did not see any.
> The CHAIRMAN. In the sanitation that is necessary on the Panama route, would you feel that it was safe without including the city of Panama and the city of Colon?
> Colonel ERNST. No; I can not say that I think it would be safe.
> The CHAIRMAN. How far is the city of Panama from the line of the canal as it is dredged from the bay there?
> Colonel ERNST. It is about 3 miles.
> The CHAIRMAN. That would be included in the canal limits, if they were 3 miles wide?
> Colonel ERNST. I certainly would prefer that they should beincluded.
> The CHAIRMAN. Would you not think that it was absolutely necessary to include it in order to preserve the sanitation, or whatever results might come from sanitation, on the Panama route?
> Colonel ERNST. I think the result would undoubtedly be better with it. It is a question of degree. You certainly could not have the same sanitary state there without that city as you can with it.
> The CHAIRMAN. That would apply equally well to Colon?
> Colonel ERNST. Yes; but Colon is nearly all owned by the Panama Railroad Company, and if you buy that you buy the city.
> The CHAIRMAN. Well, I think that is a legal question. Suppose, however, that we bought it and got the title to all the property that had passed through the hands of the railroad company and under concessions from Colombia, it would be still necessary to have the control of it in order to accomplish this sanitary purpose?
> Colonel ERNST. I think so.
> The CHAIRMAN. Well, it would be also necessary to have the control of it for police purposes?
> Colonel ERNST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What sort of a population is there at Colon and at Panama?

Colonel ERNST. Well, I could not say that it was a very high order of population. I did not come into very close personal contact with it. I would say, however, that they were a rather low order of people, a great many of them. Of course there are some respectable people there.

The CHAIRMAN. A very mixed population?

Colonel ERNST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They are a turbulent people, too, are they not?

Colonel ERNST. I would say they are; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Hard to manage?

Colonel ERNST. They are fighting and quarreling all the time; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And they are insurrectionary?

Colonel ERNST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We have had several occasions when we have had to send ships of war down there with marines aboard in order to preserve the peace and save the property that the French people have got on that Isthmus, and also to protect and guarantee the sovereignty of the Republic of Colombia over the State of Panama. That is in our treaty.

Colonel ERNST. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, in making up your estimate of the maintenance of the Panama Canal, the current expenses of maintenance and preservation and protection, etc., I suppose you took all of those elements into consideration?

Colonel ERNST. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you include the sanitation and the police control of the city of Panama, with 20,000 inhabitants?

Colonel ERNST. We did not in terms. The way we did that was to draw up an organization for the management of the canal, a separate board of control here in this country consisting of 5 members, a governor on the Isthmus with his staff and office, and then provide for 6 departments, the engineering department, with all its various assistants and appliances and the material required; the transit department, having charge of the regulation of dues and the transit and management of all pilots and all that sort of thing, and the light-houses; the medical department, charged with the quarantine regulations, the general hospitals, and the hospital supplies, the subordinate hospitals, and sanitary inspection; the police department, and a law department, and a finance department.

We had all those worked out in detail, and the medical department was charged mainly with the hospitals and subhospitals and the sanitary inspection and the quarantine service. Now, we allowed a force necessary for that, without taking into account any great city.

The CHAIRMAN. You took into account the men who were connected with the operation of the canal?

Colonel ERNST. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And the railroad?

Colonel ERNST. And the railroad. The general hospitals, which would be some little way off, probably, from the canal.

The CHAIRMAN. But you made your estimate on the number of men that would probably be employed in the navigation and management of the canal and railroad?

Colonel ERNST. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not include in it the citizenship of these cities?

Colonel ERNST. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you name here the appendix that contains those estimates? We have been very much at a loss to find out about them.

Colonel ERNST. We did not publish those, because it is purely theoretical; we felt that we could not defend every estimate of it. We felt that there were errors both ways. You can conceive of the difficulty of getting up of such an organization at a desk for a great work like that, which must actually be tested and corrected in practice. I mean it must be adjusted. There are many of those items that we felt would err, some on one side and some on the other, and we thought that they would correct each other; but doing it the same for both lines, we thought it was a fair comparison.

The CHAIRMAN. You made a comparison in your own minds, based upon facts that you yourselves had observed on the line or had learned from other sources, but you did not make up an itemized statement and balance sheet between the cost of maintenance on the one route and the other?

Colonel ERNST. Oh, yes; we went through this organization for both canals. Of course the Nicaragua Canal had the same general control. The governing board in this country would be the same as for the Panama and also the governor and his staff on the Isthmus would be the same and the chiefs of these departments would all be the same. Now, when it came to the number of posts you would have to have for police force, there would be more on the Nicaragua than on the Panama. We would have to have more engineering divisions.

The CHAIRMAN. What I want to get at is whether the items were put down on the list.

Colonel ERNST. Oh, I have got them all, and I would be very glad to show them to you. I have not got them here to-day, but I can bring them if you wish to see them.

The CHAIRMAN. They were not published?

Colonel ERNST. No.

The CHAIRMAN. I would be very glad if you will furnish us with them, because we have had a great difficulty in getting at the items of the estimate.

Colonel ERNST. It is one of those things that we are perfectly aware is open to attack, because they are approximations, but they are identical for the two lines.

The CHAIRMAN. You will furnish them to us?

Colonel ERNST. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then I will not go any further into that question.

Additional statement of Col. Oswald H. Ernst:

The CHAIRMAN. Did you get the paper I referred to?

Colonel ERNST. Yes; here it is.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like very much to have this go into the record. It may become very important if the canal should be built.

Colonel ERNST. It is very carefully gotten up. The reason we did not publish it is because there are undoubtedly errors in it. Estimates are too high in some respects and too low in others. We thought they would correct each other. The comparison, however, is a fair one. It is the same for both canals. It is a study to which we devoted a good many weeks. It is as follows:

TENTATIVE ORGANIZATION FOR THE MAINTENANCE AND OPERATION OF THE CANALS.

I. NICARAGUA CANAL.

Supreme control to rest in a board of five members, located in Washington. The duties of the board will be:

1. To make regulations for the government of the canal, including the tariff of charges, navigation rules, police and sanitary rules, and, in short, all rules required for the operation and maintenance of the canal.

2. To make or approve all appointments, the salary of which equals or exceeds $100 per month.

3. To make or approve all contracts.

4. To audit all money accounts before transmitting them to the Treasury Department.

The annual expenses of the board may be placed at $100,000.

Organization on the Isthmus.—The general control to be vested in a governor, having his headquarters at Greytown, where the general offices will be located.

The administration will be divided among six departments, viz:

A. Engineer department, charged with all the maintenance and improvement of the canal, including the repair shops and storehouses, and the repairs of public buildings; also with the location and sale or rental of lands.

B. Transit department, charged with the navigation of the canal, the assessment of dues, the service of the ports, including light-houses, and the operation of telegraph and telephone lines.

C. Medical department, charged with the hospital and other medical service, including port, quarantine, and sanitary inspection service.

D. Finance department, charged with the collection of dues, payment of salaries, and management of the funds.

E. Law department, charged with the supervision of such minor courts as may be established and with all legal matters.

F. Police department, charged with the preservation of order and with the management of the armed force required for that purpose.

The governor.—The governor will issue orders to the heads of departments, will make reports to the board of control, and conduct all correspondence with that board, and will make frequent inspection of all parts of the canal. Attached to his office will be a secretary, two clerks, two messengers, and one small inspection steamer, the latter to be available for other officials when not required by the governor.

Annual expense of governor's office.

Salaries:
Governor	$15,000
Secretary	5,000
Clerks, 2 at $1,500	3,000
Messengers, 2 at $400	800
Inspection steamer	15,000
Office supplies	500
Total	39,300

A board of five members in Washington, for the government of the Philippine Islands, with salaries corresponding with those of the Isthmian Canal Commission of $60,000 a month, would be quite as safe and useful, as this proposed board would be for the government of an isthmian canal and, probably, more expeditious in getting through with their work.

No salaries are named for this supreme board of control, and the only precedent we have on that point is that it would cost not less than $60,000 each year.

The estimated contingencies of $558,470 for the Nicaragua route and $337,362 for the Panama route, in all $895,832, included in the cost of this plan of canal government, would safely cover the estimate of $60,000 and provide living salaries for the five members of the board of supreme control, and still leave enough to pay the salary of the governor, at $15,000 per annum, and his official staff, and for a steamer for their use, which is summed up at $39,300 per annum. The total annual expense of the supreme board of control and of the governor's executive department is not to be less than $783,000 in the plan proposed for the government of the canal. This plan, although it was not adopted, is the actual basis of computation of the cost of the maintenance and operation of this canal.

Yet it is no hazardous venture to assert that, with a good, honest, industrious, and reliable engineer at the head of the enterprise, this array of salaried officials could be dispensed with far more safely than they could be employed in the conduct of the work.

It has required the estimates that were made for this novel, extravagant, and dangerous plan of canal government to support the estimates of the commission for the maintenance and operation of these canals, which have no support in the actual experience of any other canal in the world.

An argument against the Nicaragua Canal based on such estimates has no just support in fact and no sanction in the history of any other canal.

Mr. President, I have not attempted to discuss a single question that I have presented upon the mere weight of the conflicting testimony. As to many of the matters there is not one particle of conflict. The very leading issues upon which I plant myself in this case and upon which the majority of the committee plant themselves are sustained by proofs against which there is no objection and about which there is no controversy.

At the expense of very great personal risk and labor, and doubtless at the expense of the patience of the Senate, possibly of the country, I have undertaken to present those leading issues and the facts that sustain them absolutely and without controversy, for the consideration of the Senate of the United States, in giving to the majority of the committee that support of truth and justice in their action in this great case which is due to the occasion and to their own character and to the country we serve and to the prosperity we are trying to advance. I am grateful, indeed, to the Senate for having permitted me to stand this long time on my feet, even in the absence of many Senators, and trust that those who were away will take occasion, when it suits them to do so, to read what I have had to say.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

During the delivery of Mr. MORGAN'S speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEITFELD in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of the civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes; which had been reported from the Committee on the Philippines, with amendments.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Alabama will allow me to make a request, I will then ask to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside, so that he can complete his speech.

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the general reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and that it be read by paragraphs for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. I now ask that the bill may be laid temporarily aside in order that the Senator from Alabama may conclude his speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. MORGAN resumed and concluded his speech.

CHINESE EXCLUSION.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be still further temporarily laid aside in order that the Senate may proceed to consider a House bill on the Calendar. It is the bill known as the House Chinese-exclusion bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a House bill which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 13031) to prohibit the coming into and to regulate the residence within the United States, its Territories, and all territory under its jurisdiction, and the District of Columbia, of Chinese and persons of Chinese descent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut that the bill be now considered?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the language of the bill which was passed by the Senate yesterday and which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the language of the bill passed yesterday.

The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all laws now in force prohibiting and regulating the coming of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent into the United States, and the residence of such persons therein, be, and the same are hereby, extended and continued, including the act entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States," approved September 13, 1888, so far as the same is not inconsistent with treaty obligations now existing, in full force and effect until the 7th day of December, 1904, and so long as the treaty between China and the United States concluded on the 17th day of March, 1894, and proclaimed by the President on the 8th day of December, 1894, shall continue in force and said laws shall apply to all territory under the jurisdiction of the United States, and to all immigration of Chinese laborers not citizens of the United States from the island to the mainland territory of the United States, or from one portion of the island territory of the United States to another portion of said island territory: Provided, however, That said laws shall not apply to the transit of Chinese laborers from one island to another island of the same group, and any islands within the jurisdiction of any State or of the district of Alaska shall be considered part of the mainland under this section.

SEC. 2. That in case said treaty be terminated as provided in article 6 thereof this act and the acts hereby extended and continued shall remain in force until there shall be concluded between the United States and China a new treaty respecting the coming of Chinese persons into the United States, and until appropriate laws shall be passed to carry into effect the provisions thereof.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered to make and prescribe, and from time to time to change, such rules and regulations not inconsistent with the laws of the land as he may deem necessary and proper to execute the provisions of this act and of the acts hereby extended and continued and of said treaty of December 8, 1894, and with the approval of the President to appoint such agents as he may deem necessary for the efficient execution of said treaty and said acts.

SEC. 4. That nothing in the provisions of this act or any other act shall be construed to prevent, hinder, or restrict any foreign exhibitor, representative, or citizen of any foreign nation, or the holder, who is a citizen of any foreign nation, of any concession or privilege from any fair or exposition authorized by act of Congress, from bringing into the United States, under contract, such mechanics, artisans, agents, or other employees, natives of their respective foreign countries, as they or any of them may deem necessary for the purpose of making preparation for installing or conducting their exhibits or of preparing for installing or conducting any business authorized or permitted under or by virtue of or pertaining to any concession or privilege which may have been or may be granted by any said fair or exposition in connection with such exposition, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, both as to the admission and return of such person or persons.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of every Chinese laborer, other than a citizen, rightfully in, and entitled to remain in, any of the insular territory of the United States (Hawaii excepted), at the time of the passage of this act, to obtain within one year after the passage of this act a certificate of residence, in the mainland territory or the insular territory wherein he resides.

To obtain such certificate he shall apply to the appropriate Treasury officer, who, if satisfied on inquiry that the applicant is rightfully within the United States and rightfully within the portion of the territory of the United States where he applies, shall issue to him such certificate without charge. The certificate shall contain the name, age, local residence, and occupation of the applicant, his personal signature, and such other matter as may be required by the rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner-General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. It shall further contain the photograph of the applicant, made at the time and in the manner required by said rules and regulations. A duplicate of the certificate shall be retained by the officer issuing the original, and the duplicate shall contain a duplicate photograph, provided as in the case of the original.

Any person bound under this section to obtain a certificate of residence who shall neglect, fail, or refuse to comply with the provisions hereof, or who, after the expiration of the said one year, shall be found within the jurisdiction of the United States without such certificate of residence shall be deemed and adjudged to be unlawfully within the United States, and may be arrested by any officer of the United States and taken before a United States judge, or before a commissioner of any United States court to be designated by a United States attorney; and it shall be the duty of said judge or said commissioner to order that he be deported from the United States unless he shall clearly establish to the satisfaction of said judge or commissioner that by reason of accident, sickness, or other unavoidable cause he has been unable to procure his certificate, and that, the one-year time limit aside, he is rightfully entitled to such certificate; and if upon such showing it shall appear that he is thus circumstanced, a certificate of residence shall be granted him.

No person shall be given a certificate of residence under any section of this act or be entitled to a reissue of any lost certificate of residence who, prior to his application therefor, shall have been convicted of any crime within the jurisdiction of the United States or any State or Territory or insular territory thereof. Any such person, being thus without such certificate, shall be deported.

Immediately after the passage of this act the Commissioner-General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe and enforce all needful rules and regulations for the registration and certifications by this section required, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall appoint the officers for effecting such registration and certifications, authorizing the payment to them of such compensation in the nature of fees, in addition to their salaries as now allowed by law, as he shall deem necessary, not exceeding $1 for every certificate issued.

That should it appear that any laborer to whom was lawfully issued a certificate of residence under this act has lost such certificate, or that it has been destroyed, he shall be given a new certificate by the appropriate Treasury officer, on establishing to the satisfaction of the United States judge or commissioner before whom he is brought for deportation that the loss or destruction was not in bad faith.

SEC. 6. That in any insular territory of the United States where the United States has not established United States courts and has not provided United States marshals the judicial functions vested in United States judges shall be vested in judges of the highest local courts in such territory, and the executive functions vested in United States attorneys and marshals shall be vested in the corresponding local officers in such territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The title is a little different, but I think I will not move to amend the title.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 18, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 17, 1902.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

THOMAS F. WALTER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States:

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, House bill No. 5761, entitled "An act granting a pension to Thomas F. Walter."

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension roll the name of Thomas F. Walter, late first lieutenant Company A, Ninety-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $17 per month.

The records of the War Department show that this soldier was cashiered by sentence of a general court-martial April 16, 1865, upon a finding that he was guilty of the charge of disobedience of orders, in that he had deliberately refused to comply with a detail to go on picket duty December 31, 1864.

He has applied for pension under different laws at different times and for different causes, but his applications have been denied by the Pension Bureau.

The disobedience of orders, of which the soldier was found guilty, is admitted by him, and, in view of his position in the service, was with full knowledge of the consequences. To inscribe his name on the pension roll, as this bill contemplates, would be to condone an inexcusable offense by a commissioned officer, to detract from the high estimate in which the pension roll ought ever to be held, and to do an injustice to soldiers now on that roll, especially those under the act of June 27, 1890, where an honorable discharge from the service is a condition precedent to obtaining pension.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, April 16, 1901.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and I ask unanimous consent that the report made by the committee on the bill be printed in the RECORD, with the veto message, as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire moves that the bill and the message of the President be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and also asks unanimous consent that the report of the committee on the bill may be printed in the RECORD as a part of his remarks. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like to ask how long this report is?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Well, it is two or three pages of the usual size.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think it is usual that the argument should be made when the bill is reported back for consideration by the House. It is not the purpose of the gentleman to consider it now, is it?

Mr. SULLOWAY. If the gentleman will permit me, I desire to say that I think it is only fair to the committee that the facts reported by the committee should go with the message, and I ask it in behalf of the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I suppose it is the intention of the committee to return the bill to the House for consideration, is it not?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I am not speaking for the committee as to what it is going to do.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If it is not, I would like to ask the gentleman what is the object of the request?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I am not authorized by the committee to say one thing or another as what it will do, but I think it is only fair to the committee that the facts as stated in the report should go along with the veto message.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is a fact that the committee has not considered the veto message yet.

Mr. SULLOWAY. We have not had it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is not usual to print an argument if you are not going to consider the message. I will not object, as I find the report is not long.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chairs hears none.

The bill and report are as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5761) granting a pension to Thomas F. Walter.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas F. Walter, late first lieutenant Company A, Ninety-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $17 per month.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5761) granting a pension to Thomas F. Walter, submit the following report:

This bill proposes to pension this soldier at $50 per month.

A similar bill, granting this officer a pension of $17 per month, was favorably recommended by your committee in the Fifty-sixth Congress. A copy of the report of that Congress is herewith.

There has been filed with your committee in this Congress a mass of papers as to the soldier's services and disabilities, substantially as set forth in the report of the previous Congress.

For the reasons set forth in the report of the Fifty-sixth Congress, this bill is reported back, with the recommendation that it pass after the same shall have been amended as follows:

In line 8 strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "seventeen."

[House Report No. 1612, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7203) granting a pension to Thomas F. Walter, submit the following report:

This bill (H. R. 7203) proposes to pension Thomas F. Walter at $50 per month.

The records of the War Department show that this soldier enlisted as sergeant in Company A, Ninety-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, August 20, 1861; he reenlisted December 24, 1863; was promoted to first lieutenant, to date December 14, 1864; that he was cashiered by sentence of a general court-martial April 16, 1865, having been found guilty of the charge of disobedience of orders, in that, having been duly detailed to go on picket by the adjutant, December 31, 1864, and having been advised by the colonel of the regiment that he could not be excused unless upon the surgeon's certificate, he did positively refuse to obey orders; and the medical records of the War Department show that he was under treatment from July, 1863, for wound of the foot, and in September, 1863, for diarrhea.

He applied for pension under the general law on December 22, 1873, on account of wound of foot, received at the battle of Gettysburg, July 3, 1863; and on July 5, 1889, he filed another claim on account of wound of shoulder, the bullet striking the back part of shoulder, passing obliquely across the back, and striking the spine, and resulting in disease of the nervous system, received in front of Petersburg, Va., in June, 1864, and filed proof in corroboration of his allegations as to these wounds; but these claims were rejected in March, 1874, and November, 1899, respectively, upon the ground that there had been no ratable disability from the alleged wound of the right foot since the officer's discharge from the service, nor from the alleged gunshot wound of right shoulder and spine and alleged resulting disabilities since the filing of the claim for said disabilities.

Proof was filed in the Pension Bureau to the effect that since about 1881 his physical condition, as a result of the wound of the shoulder and spine, had been such as to disable him to a great extent; and one physician, who testified in the case in 1891, described the condition of the beneficiary as follows:

"I find him affected with chronic inflammation of the anterior columns of the spinal cord, due, as he believes, to the wound of the spine received by said Walter in battle; the ankle clonus is deficient; the electro-faradic contractability is lessened, as is also the galvanic irritability to a still greater extent, a current from forty Barrett cells being imperceptible to the patient. These symptoms lead the deponent to believe that said Walter suffers with chronic myelitis, especially of the anterior columns, such as would be induced by an injury similar to that received by him at Petersburg."

The first examination of the beneficiary, had on February 18, 1874, revealed no disability from the gunshot wound of the foot. The next one, had August 25, 1891, also stated that there was no scar on any portion of the right foot, no atrophy or contractions, no lameness; and this board of surgeons also failed to find any scar or other external evidence of any injury to the right shoulder, no tenderness over the spine, no nausea, convulsions, or epilepsy, no paralysis, and no muscular tremors, except of the tongue. The next medical examination, made on February 1, 1893, states that the only disability the board could find was excessive nervousness, the cause of which could not be determined; and this board of surgeons further stated that they could not find any evidence of any injury to any portion of the spine nor of the back; that the reflexes are all normal; that there is no paresis, loss of memory, or indication of mental derangement, no anæsthesia, no mark of injury to the foot, and rated him $6 for neurasthenia.

The last medical examination, made October 30, 1899, describes the beneficiary as a healthy-looking, well-nourished, muscular man; and this board also failed to find any evidence of any wound of the foot, or any scars either on the shoulder or over the spine, or other evidences of results of a gunshot wound, no evidence of any cerebro-spinal disease, the reflexes being normal, no incoordination, and special senses normal.

The claim under the act of June 27, 1890, filed by the beneficiary July 10, 1894, was rejected May 12, 1896, upon the ground that, not having been honorably discharged from his service during the war of the rebellion, title to pension under that act could not obtain.

There has been filed with your committee the sworn statement of the beneficiary, reciting his military services and the wounds received by him while so serving; that he was suffering from wounds and lung trouble, and was under treatment at Harewood Hospital; that early in December, 1864, he returned to his regiment, having been in no way benefited; that the day after his arrival at the regiment he informed the lieutenant-colonel, then commanding the regiment, of the condition of his health, and that he was unfit to properly perform his duties; that on December 31, 1864, he was detailed for picket duty, and feeling unable to do even camp duty, addressed a letter to Lieutenant-Colonel Sellers, stating that the condition of his health made it his duty to refuse to go on picket; that the lieutenant-colonel returned the note stating that unless the surgeon excused him the deponent would have to go or be placed in arrest; that he was accordingly put under arrest, tried by court-martial for disobedience of orders; that he pleaded guilty to the charge and specifications, and not comprehending the importance of making a statement to the court in reference to the case, declined to do so; that General Gregory, however, proposed to tell the court what he knew of deponent's character, and that his testimony was as follows:

"Lieutenant Walter has been in my command for three years, and I know him to be a man of sterling integrity, as a man and a soldier."

(This statement is borne out by the record of the proceedings of the court-martial.)

That a few years after the war his wound began to distress him to an extent so as to seriously interfere with his business and pleasure; that he continued much the same for about fifteen years, and then the old trouble that followed the wound of his spine revived and, in seeming combination with the wound of foot, brought him into his present serious condition; that he has been compelled to give up business; that his body shows no scars from the wounds; that such an examination as the pension examining surgeons have given him is far from adequate to prove what his disabilities are, or to determine their origin.

He also filed a number of affidavits of neighbors and acquaintances to the effect that during the last ten years he had been a great sufferer and wholly unfitted and incapacitated for performing any manual labor or undergoing any fatigue, as a result of the wounds received in the service; and also medical testimony of Dr. William H. Blake, whose affidavit is herewith:

In the matter of Thomas F. Walter, late first lieutenant Company A, Ninety-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry; H. R. No. 7203.

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia County, ss:

Before me, a notary public of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, residing at Philadelphia, personally appeared Dr. William H. Blake, whose post-office address is No. 2116 North Mervine street, and who, being by me duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

That during the last few years I have been several times consulted professionally by Thomas F. Walter, and the following is a summary of the symptoms and ailments which he has from time to time made known to me, viz: That he can not lie for any length of time on his right side because the right hip becomes so painful; can not lie upon the left side because the injured lung then becomes painful; can not lie upon his back because of a severe pain then caused, which begins at the point where the spine was wounded and extends upward. This pain comes on gradually, grows more severe, and soon compels him to change position, the result being that he restlessly changes position all night (being only quiet when lying on his stomach), which, together with the extremely uncomfortable and irritating sensations, due to imperfect circulation in the lower limbs, prevents his securing that amount of restful sleep at night necessary for his well-being during the day.

That for some time after his right foot was wounded he had much less control over the right leg than over the left, it often requiring a positive effort of the will to move it in walking, and that he does not think there has been a day during the last twenty-six years in which he has not suffered, and at times severely (and more so of late), from a sore, bruised-feeling pain in the wounded foot, which often causes him to limp in walking.

That for six or eight years he has at times been greatly inconvenienced in his work because of temporary lapses of contractive power in the muscles of his fingers, so that he would drop his tools, and found it difficult to handle small articles.

That at times, for short periods, he finds it difficult to articulate distinctly for lack of power over the tongue.

That ever since the war he has been afflicted with feeble digestion, a torpid liver, and inert bowels, so that constipation was habitual and hemorrhoids one of the results, which later often became so distressing as to prevent his working at his trade, and that such has been his condition for the last ten years I have personal knowledge, having been intimately acquainted with him during that time.

I have also personal knowledge that during the entire of those ten years he has been so peculiar in his mental characteristics as to excite attention and comment among his comrades of the Grand Army of the Republic post of which he is a past commander; that he is mentally irritable and erratic, and that his forgetfulness has often caused him much inconvenience and pecuniary loss while working at his trade; that being so unreliable as to his ability to accomplish any steady amount of work in any stated time, he can no longer hold any position as an employee; that for the same reasons he is unable to carry on a business employing others, and is compelled to depend upon the little he can occasionally do for his friends and acquaintances as an upholsterer.

That to the best of my knowledge and belief he is a strictly abstemious, moral, and honorable man, who has always been of good habits, and who has the respect of all his acquaintances.

And in the absence of any other known and capable cause, it seems probable that this general tendency to the paretic condition may be due to some obscure spinal injury sustained when he was wounded.

That I served for one year (until discharged for disability) as hospital steward in the Thirty-sixth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry; that I afterwards acted for two and a half years as assistant superintendent of the Pennsylvania training school for feeble-minded children, and during the last thirty years have been in active practice as a physician in the city of Philadelphia.

WILLIAM H. BLAKE, M. D.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, a notary public, February 10, A. D. 1900; and I hereby certify that the affiant is a practicing physician in good professional standing, and that I have no interest, direct or indirect, in the prosecution of this claim.

[SEAL.] THOS. CUMMINGS,
Notary Public, 1417 Columbia Avenue, Philadelphia, Pa.

There has also been filed with your committee the following resolutions:

HEADQUARTERS GENERAL E. D. BAKER POST, No. 8,
GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
Philadelphia, Pa., March 8, 1900.

Whereas Thomas F. Walter, a member of General E. D. Baker Post, No. 8, Department of Pennsylvania, Grand Army of the Republic, Philadelphia, Pa., applied to Congress for a special act in his pension claim No. 7203, now in the hands of the Committee on Pensions of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., be it

Resolved, That we, his fellow-comrades of said post (numbering nearly 500), do hereby desire to record ourselves on behalf of Comrade Walter's claim. He is a past post commander in good standing, a comrade of high character and integrity, and an honorable gentleman, who we know from personal acquaintance is disabled and entitled to the relief he asks for in the bill, and it should receive prompt action, as he is growing old.

Unanimously adopted by the post at its regular meeting March 8, 1900, and respectfully forwarded.

THOS. CUMMINGS,
Commander E. D. Baker Post, No. 8, G. A. R.,
Department of Pennsylvania.

From the above it is clearly shown that the beneficiary rendered efficient service for nearly four years; that he was wounded in the service, and that his present disabilities, according to the testimony of Dr. Blake, quoted above, are no doubt traceable to his army service; and in the opinion of your committee a pension at the rate of $17 per month seems to be warranted under the circumstances, and the bill is reported back with the recommendation that it pass after the same shall have been amended as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas F. Walter, late first lieutenant Company A, Ninety-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $17 per month."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire, to refer the message and the accompanying papers to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

CUBAN RECIPROCITY BILL.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12765.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12765) to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I base my opposition to this bill upon the principle which I have heretofore announced in this House, that the legislation contemplated in this bill is premature with reference to the island of Cuba, which is domestic territory, territory belonging to the United States just as much as the Territory of Hawaii, the Philippine Islands, or the island of Porto Rico; and therefore this legislation is not only ill timed, but absolutely unnecessary. I think, first, that it is the highest duty of this Congress to establish the status of Cuba with reference to its relations to the United States. The bill under consideration practically acknowledges that the island of Cuba has no government.

If they have no government, they have no sovereignty. They must be subject to the sovereignty of some other country, and it can not be any other country than the United States; and therefore the very opening words of the bill make the concession that the principle I am contending for is right. And I insist that the terms upon which this Government is asked to relinquish its title and its sovereignty should be considered. The American people have never had their attention called to this vital question. They have never considered the question as to whether or not Cuba is domestic or foreign territory. If it is domestic territory, they do not propose that it should be legislated away from them and their rights disturbed by the indirect legislation contemplated in this bill. It will never do to tell the American people that it is foreign territory and therefore no rights of theirs will be infringed.

I was very much pleased the other day when I listened to the remarks of the eloquent gentleman on the other side of this House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], when he was talking against what he called the acquisition of Cuba. He went to work and, in my judgment, libeled the Democratic party, when he said that on that side there had been great interest on the part of the Democratic party to annex Cuba, but, as he said, in the interest of slavery. I want to call the attention of this House to the fact, Mr. Chairman, that a very large number of the prominent Whigs of this country were in favor of the annexation of Cuba, and that was not in the interest of slavery. But he bases his opposition to it on the ground that it is not in the interests of labor. That is not the question now for our consideration.

But I want to say to the other side of this Chamber that for over one hundred years this nation sought to acquire Cuba, and most powerful arguments were made from Jefferson down to Buchanan in favor of the annexation of Cuba. Not only did it include every Democratic statesman that figured in this country from Jefferson to Buchanan, but, as I have said, a large number of prominent Whigs favored annexation. If any gentleman wants to find the history of this question, I respectfully refer him to two speeches I have made on this subject, recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the 13th of January and the 13th of March last, where I have brought together all that the great statesmen on both sides have said with reference to this question. Most powerful commercial arguments were made, and physical arguments were introduced, and they are just as powerful to-day, Mr. Chairman, as they were in the hours in which they were made.

No gentleman has ever arisen to dispute the logic of the arguments made in favor of the annexation of Cuba, and every single Democrat in this House that votes against the proposition that Cuba is domestic territory, goes back on his political hero, Mr. Jefferson, and every Democrat from his day to Mr. Buchanan, including the platforms of the Democratic party.

There is no use in arguing as to whether or not it is wise—the proposition is simply here. This nation has gone as far away from home as Hawaii and the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico, and there is no reason presented why we should abandon Cuba and allow her to become a foreign government.

I was very much interested the other day when the very able and distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, in introducing this bill into the House, stated as I understood it, two remarkable propositions—very remarkable propositions. He said, as I understood him, that Cuba is foreign territory, and we are soon going to have it. Now, I want to say to that distinguished gentleman, and every other gentleman interested in this question, if he will study this question for himself, he will come to the conclusion that Cuba is domestic territory and not foreign territory. I would like to know from him, as the leader of this House, where he obtained his authority for saying that we are soon going to have Cuba. It is contrary to his will, he said, but we are going to have it.

I say if we have got her, as I contend we have—and coupled with that the assertion of the leader of the House that we are soon going to have it—now is the time to determine this question, and not in the future. I say it is most remarkable, after what this nation has done in the interest of Cuba, after it has cost us over $300,000,000 to free her; that after we have done all this we are asked to-day to give her $8,000,000 more and then let her go and let her try her political freedom for a while; and, after she becomes impaired, after she has cost us an additional sum of money, we are to take her back—it is not stated when, only that we will soon have her.

If there are any reasons why we should soon have her, if there are any reasons why we ought to have her, I say the sooner it is determined the better, both in the interests of this Government and in the interests of the people of Cuba.

Mr. Chairman, it is a very remarkable thing that when we stand up in this House and demand in the interests of our constituents, demand in the interest of the people of Washington, that some money should be appropriated in their interest on the part of the Federal Government, we are met with the assertion that it costs too much, and we can not spend that amount of money. And yet our nation stands ready, under the leadership of this House, to give away unlimited amounts to a foreign people, without knowing who is going to spend it or for what particular interest it is going to be expended.

I want to say to my friends who are wondering what the Supreme Court of the United States said on this question that there is a statement by the Supreme Court of the United States to be found in the so-called Neely case, very strong, I concede, against my position. I appreciate that the court in that case said that under legal and constitutional and international law Cuba was foreign territory; but I invite every gentleman interested in this question to study that case, and after he had studied it he will wonder why, under the reasoning implied by that court, the court made that announcement, because they absolutely destroy the force of every statement, and demonstrate in that particular case before they get through that every contention I am claiming in this case is true.

I want to invite attention to one or two things the Supreme Court of the United States has said in a subsequent case bearing upon this particular question. I cite from the case of De Lima against Bidwell, 102 United States, page 197, where the Supreme Court of the United States in this particular case says:

By parity of reasoning the country ceases to be foreign the instant it becomes domestic.

They further say that it is impossible for it to be both domestic and foreign territory at the same time. I am sustained in this conclusion by the opinion of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, recently rendered by the Supreme Court in the Diamond Rings case, where he says:

That territory can not be foreign and domestic at the same time; it must be either one or the other.

In 182 United States Reports, page 195, the Supreme Court of the United States extensively discusses the question whether any act of Congress is necessary to transfer title and sovereignty, and after a very interesting discussion of this question they say that no act of Congress is necessary; that under the law of conquest, under international law, the territory of Cuba passed to the United States.

On page 198 they further discuss this particular question. They say:

The theory that a country remains foreign with respect to the tariff laws until Congress has acted by embracing it within the customs union presupposes that a country may be domestic for one purpose and foreign for another. If an act of Congress be necessary to convert a foreign country into domestic territory, the question at once suggests itself, what is the character of the legislation demanded for this purpose? Will an act appropriating money for its purchase be sufficient? Apparently not.

And the court give a great many other illustrations, finally concluding their opinion on this point by saying:

We are unable to acquiesce in this assumption that a territory may be at the same time both foreign and domestic.

Now, when we consider, Mr. Chairman, as we read in the morning papers that Cuba is under the absolute domination of the United States, that we are directing her to do just exactly what she must do, that under the so-called Platt amendment she is compelled to yield absolute obedience to the military governor appointed by the United States and acting under our authority, the view which I am maintaining is still further fortified.

In 182 U. S. Reports, page 385, the Supreme Court of the United States tells us just exactly what was decided in this so-called Neely case. They discuss the question at considerable length; and if any gentleman interested in the case will take up this decision and consider it for himself, he will discover that the proposition I am announcing here to-day is amply sustained, not only by the majority opinion, but by the opinion of every gentleman at that time composing that court. The court, in that decision, held in effect that upon the ratification of a treaty title and sovereignty absolutely passed, and there is no difference whatever between the acquisition of territory by treaty and acquisition under the law of conquest. And this is the opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan, who dissented from the opinion of the court in the case of Downes v. Bidwell. And it is the same learned justice who wrote the opinion in the case of Neely, to which I have referred.

Now, I want to call attention to what the Supreme Court of the United States has said in support of my contention, and the opinion which I cite was delivered long subsequent to the Neely case. On page 295, 182 United States Reports, the justice writing the dissenting opinion says:

Cuba is under the dominion of the United States.

I want nothing further to support my contention than the statement of a learned judge like the one who wrote the opinion that "Cuba is under the dominion of the United States." If it is "under the dominion of the United States," then we are exercising sovereignty there; which, as the Supreme Court says, is the true and only absolute test on this question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he was reading from the dissenting opinion?

Mr. JENKINS. That is the language of the justice who wrote the dissenting opinion; but it is in accord with the opinion of the court, because the court unanimously decides in the Neely case and all subsequent cases that the island of Cuba is under the absolute dominion of the United States.

Mr. CLARK. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. JENKINS. I will, if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. CLARK. If Cuba is a part of the United States, then we ought to have absolute free trade with her, ought we not?

Mr. JENKINS. We ought under the law to have it; and I propose before I get through to demonstrate to this House that they are entitled to it, and that every dollar of customs duties paid between Cuba and the United States can be recovered under the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States. I agree with the gentleman from Missouri on that proposition.

Mr. CLARK. If what the gentleman says is true, then what are the beet-sugar men kicking about? [Laughter.]

Mr. JENKINS. This question is further discussed in 182 United States Reports, page 343; but my time is too limited to permit me to go into an examination of that decision. On page 344 the dissenting justice concurs in my proposition, for he says:

It can not be denied that under the rule clearly settled in Neely v. Henkle (supra) the sovereignty of the United States may be extended over foreign territory, to remain paramount until in the discretion of the political department of the Government of the United States it be relinquished.

On page 391 of this same report Justice Harlan, dissenting, who wrote the opinion for the courts in the so-called Neely case, says:

In my opinion Porto Rico became, at least after the ratification of the treaty with Spain, a part of and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States in respect of all its territory and people, and Congress could not thereafter impose any duty, impost or excise, with respect to that island and its inhabitants which departed from the rule of uniformity established by the Constitution.

I say in that case Justice Harlan absolutely reversed himself in the so-called Neely case, when he says that the territory became a part of the territory of the United States. He only divides with the court upon the uniformity question, and that position also is sustained by the Chief Justice of the United States in the so-called Diamond Rings case, where the learned Chief Justice says:

The Philippines thereby ceased, in the language of the treaty, to be Spanish, and ceasing to be Spanish they ceased to be foreign country. They came under the complete and absolute sovereignty and dominion of the United States, and so became territory of the United States over which civil government could be established. The result was the same, although there was no stipulation that the native inhabitants should be incorporated in the body politic, and not securing to them the right to choose their nationality, their allegiance became due to the United States, and they became entitled to its protection.

As a matter of principle, there is no difference between that island and the island of Cuba. Mr. Chairman, whatever is said by the Supreme Court on that question as to what was decided in the Neely case is absolutely inconsistent, in my judgment, with the statement of the Chief Justice of the United States in the subsequent cases. The Supreme Court of the United States, in justifying the case of Neely against Henkle, at page 343, says:

That the court unanimously held in that case that Cuba was not incorporated in the United States and was a foreign country.

The learned justice who wrote that opinion apparently resting his judgment on the question that that territory was not incorporated into the United States. I deny, as far as I am concerned, that it is necessary that it should be incorporated into the United States in order to become domestic territory, because Chief Justice Fuller, in the opinion from which I have quoted, dissents entirely from that proposition and corroborates my view. On page 198 of this same book the Supreme Court of the United States further discusses this question at considerable length, and it is well worth the time of any gentleman interested in it to follow it for the purpose of determining what the Supreme Court has decided.

I want to say to this House and to gentlemen who are contending that Cuba is foreign territory, inasmuch as they rely upon the resolutions of April 28, 1898, that seem to have so largely influenced the Supreme Court of the United States, that we have not lived up to those resolutions. Mr. Chairman, according to those resolutions the United States disclaimed "any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands, except for the pacification thereof," and asserts its determination when that is accomplished to leave the government and control of the islands to the people. The word "pacification" relates to the trouble existing between Spain and Cuba, and not to any trouble existing between Cuba and the United States, and therefore I insist pacification has become complete and real and we are therefore acting in open violation of our declarations of April 28, 1898, where we recite and notify Cuba in the act of March 2, 1901, that she can not become an independent government, she can not assume sovereignty until she has incorporated into her government certain conditions that we insist upon.

Now, then, that is a complete violation of our declaration, and future history will read that we have not been true upon this proposition, telling the people of the world that it was our intention solely to interfere for the pacification of the island, and when that was complete we would withdraw, but we have not done it. We have held absolute sovereignty and jurisdiction over that island, and we are now, while they are in our custody and in our keeping and within our sovereignty, dictating to them and telling them what sort of government they must set up and erect before we will relinquish our power over them. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is said in opposition to my argument that the President of the United States is authorized by this act of March 2, 1901, to do what? I will tell you just exactly what that act provides:

The President is hereby authorized to leave the government and control of the island of Cuba to its people as soon as a government shall have been established in said island under a constitution, which either as a part thereof or in an ordinance appended thereto, shall define the future relations of the United States with Cuba, substantially as follows:

Upon that I am arguing and contending that we are violating our pledge as far as our pledge is concerned, but the only power that the President of the United States has under that resolution is to leave the government of the island to the people thereof. Mr. Chairman, that does not return sovereignty, it does not return title, nor does it return the allegiance of the people of Cuba to the United States, because when we acquired that island as a matter of conquest, title, sovereignty, passed to the United States and the allegiance of the people was due to the United States, and it can not be transferred or abrogated by the mere act of the President acting in conformity to the act of March 2, 1901. All the President can do is to withdraw the troops, but, as I understand, Mr. Chairman, as I read in the newspapers—and that is the only source of my information—all the President intends to do under the exercise of that power is to retain a part of the territory of Cuba, which would be an absolute violation of our declaration and our pledge, and leave troops upon that island to protect the interest of the United States, which is an absolute violation of our pledge, and then turn a limited government over to the people of the island, retaining sovereignty ourselves.

I insist, as I have said, that by that one act it is impossible for the United States to return the title, the sovereignty that we now enjoy, and divest ourselves of the allegiance that the people of Cuba owe to the United States under the law of conquest, according to international law. Mr. Chairman, even assuming that the President has that power, I am arguing now that the President up to this time has not acted, and this Congress has no official information as to his intention in this regard. As I will show you later on, the Supreme Court of the United States sustains my position and says that we do hold the title and the sovereignty of Cuba, but in trust. I will discuss that more at length by and by; but that is sustaining my contention, that the President has not acted. We have no official information as to what he will do, but I want to say right here to the Congress of the United States and to the country that Congress can not delegate its power to the President, and the only powers they have given him practically is to withdraw the troops and to leave the island and the people there to themselves; but, Mr. Chairman, that does not return the sovereignty, it does not return title, it does not relieve us from the great responsibility that has been forced upon us by the law of conquest and our occupancy——

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. JENKINS. My time is so limited I can not do it. I would be glad to if I had time. Now, assuming that the position stated here by the learned gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is correct, that it is foreign territory, I want to ask him, as the leader of the Republican party, if it is foreign country, why the United States is exercising power over that country? It seems to me to be a very serious question. If it is foreign country, what are we doing there? Why are we legislating with reference to it? And I am surprised that the leader on the other side of this Chamber, one of the most eloquent and able gentlemen in this House [Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee], does not arise on this occasion and say that the Constitution of the United States has been violated, but he is so happy because he is keeping company with the leader of the Republican party that he forgets his duty. [Laughter.] Instead of rising up here and saying that the Constitution is being openly violated and that there is absolutely no power in the Congress of the United States to legislate with reference to foreign country, he is silent when he considers the fact that he is now permitted to associate with the political leader of the Republican party.

They both, it seems to me, forget their duty at this time in failing to recognize and legislate with reference to the proposition that Cuba is domestic and not foreign territory. I was very much interested, Mr. Chairman, the other morning in reading the remarks of that celebrated Democrat in New York, Mr. Hill, who is seeking to be President of the United States. I have no interest in his success, but I am surprised at the ignorance of that gentleman with reference to the political history of the United States. He regrets that Jefferson is not alive, and wonders what Jefferson would do upon this occasion. He probably would do what the great and distinguished leader of the Democracy [Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee] has done on this occasion. He would consort with the Republican leader, because they want to be in harmony upon this question. Why, we are following in the footsteps of Jefferson, Mr. Chairman. Jefferson invaded foreign territory contrary to his own judgment, contrary to his constitutional views, and when he obtained it, according to his view, in an unconstitutional way, he legislated with reference to it absolutely uninfluenced by the Constitution, as we now insist was right. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that every dollar of duty paid into the United States Treasury by the importers who brought goods from Cuba to the United States since the ratification of the treaty of peace can be recovered, and no gentleman can dissent from that proposition if he will only carefully examine this question by himself. [Applause.]

"It can not, it is submitted, be questioned that under this provision of the treaty, as long as the occupation of the United States lasts, the benign sovereignty of the United States extends over and dominates the island of Cuba. Likewise it is not, it seems to me, questionable that the period when that sovereignty is to cease is to be determined by the legislative department of the Government of the United States in the exercise of the great duties imposed upon it and with the sense of the responsibility which it owes to the people of the United States, and the high respect which it of course feels for all the moral obligations by which the Government of the United States may, either expressedly or impliedly, be bound, considering the provisions of this treaty and reviewing the pledges of this Government extraneous to that instrument, by which the sovereignty of Cuba is to be held by the United States for the benefit of the people of Cuba and for their account, to be relinquished to them when the conditions justify its accomplishment."

This citation will be found in the case of Downes v. Bidwell.

It more than sustains all I claim, and I want to ask here and now if the legislative department of Government has determined when our sovereignty over the island is to cease. No one will question my statement now when I say that our sovereignty has not ceased and that the legislative department of Government has not acted. Until it acts, sovereignty and title remains with the United States, and the allegiance of the people of Cuba are due to the United States.

This citation also shows the correctness of my position, that we not only obtained title and sovereignty by conquest, but that it was ratified by a treaty. Let it be borne in mind that this decision of the Supreme Court was made long subsequent to the declaration of war and the act of March 2, 1901.

I want to quote the Supreme Court accurately. I have not the slightest desire of misrepresenting the court or any single member of that court. But as I have read all of what might be called the Philippine and Porto Rico cases decided up to this time by that court, I arrive at the following conclusions, that the court is unanimous on at least three propositions:

(1) That the title and sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and the island of Porto Rico are complete in the United States.

(2) That within the meaning of the tariff act those islands were during the military occupation and until the treaty was ratified and exchanged foreign territory, and duties were not only collectable on all goods shipped into the United States from those islands, but that the same duties should and must be collected under the military arm of Government.

(3) That after the ratification and exchange of the treaty Congress could legislate in its own time—that is, as I understand it, immediately after the publication of the treaty or, to further illustrate it, wait one hundred years. The court by a majority of its members decided the following propositions:

That after the ratification of the treaty and before any legislation by Congress tariff duties could not be collected on any articles of merchandise shipped from those islands to the United States, but Congress could legislate in its own time, uninfluenced by the Constitution, as the Constitution does not follow the flag. That statement, as I understand it, correctly represents all that the court in the many decisions have disposed of. The minority of the court laid down the following propositions in opposition to the majority: That the islands referred to were foreign territory within the meaning of the tariff act until Congress legislated with reference to those islands, as I understand it, either by extending the tariff legislation of the United States over those islands or of making those islands a part of the United States proper. And the legislation of Congress must be uniform, as the Constitution does follow the flag. On account of the fact that many decisions have been made by that court since the so-called Neely case and the foregoing statements representing the majority and minority views of all the cases, it will be necessary to subdivide the views of the majority and the minority. It is necessary to subdivide them, as there were at least two main propositions involved, the dissenting justices in regard to one proposition helping to make the majority in the other; in other words, one justice being with the majority in both cases and four of the justices that were with the majority in one case composed the minority in the other. The majority views on the other proposition are as follows:

Upon the ratification of the treaty the islands referred to became territory of the United States, but not such a part of the United States that Congress in legislating would have to be governed and controlled by the Constitution, but that until Congress did legislate in regard to the tariff no tariff duties could be collected on any articles of merchandise shipped from those islands into the United States proper. The minority on this question contended that the islands referred to were foreign within the meaning of the tariff law until Congress legislated, and that until Congress legislated appropriately the islands referred to were acquired territory only and not territory within the acknowledged limits of the United States.

On the second proposition the views of the majority, as I understand it, are as follows:

Congress can legislate with reference to all territory acquired by conquest or treaty, uninfluenced by the Constitution, as the Constitution does not follow the flag. That while it is territory of the United States it is not incorporated into the United States so as to be governed by the Constitution, subject only to be governed by the will of Congress. The views of the minority, as I understand the same, are as follows:

As the territory in question is part of the United States all duties, imposts, and excises, according to the Constitution, must be uniform, as the Constitution follows the flag. In other words, and in short, the majority holds that until the so-called Foraker Act became operative no duties could be collected on any articles of merchandise shipped from the islands in question to the United States; that the so-called Foraker Act is constitutional, as uniformity within the meaning of the Constitution cited does not apply to the islands in question. In this connection, and at least in part sustaining my views, the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice White, delivered December 2, 1901, in the case of Dooley v. The United States, can be read with interest and profit. In that opinion the learned justice states, in part:

> Is Porto Rico a country foreign to the United States in the sense that it is not within the sovereignty and not subject to the legislative authority of the United States is, then, the issue. In De Lima v. Bidwell and Dooley v. The United States, supra, it was held that instantly upon the ratification of the treaty with Spain, Porto Rico ceased to be a foreign country within the meaning of the tariff laws of the United States.
> In the case of the Diamond Rings it has just been held that the Philippine Islands immediately upon the ratification of the treaty ceased to be foreign country within the meaning of the tariff laws, and, of course, as these islands were acquired by the same treaty by which Porto Rico was acquired, this ruling is predicated on the decisions in De Lima and Dooley, above referred to. It is true that both in the De Lima and the Dooley cases, as well as in the case of the Diamond Rings, just decided, dissents were announced. None of the dissents rested, however, upon the theory that Porto Rico or the Philippine Islands have not come under the sovereignty and become subject to the legislative authority of the United States, but were based on the ground that legislation by Congress was necessary to bring the territory within the line of the tariff laws in force at the time of the acquisition, and especially was this the case where the new territory had not, as the result of the acquisition, been incorporated into the United States as an integral part thereof, though coming under its sovereignty and subject as a possession to the legislative power of Congress.

There is no difference between the island of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands and the island of Cuba in legal effect. The title and the sovereignty to and over Cuba was acquired by conquest on the part of the United States and absolute relinquishment of both sovereignty and the title by Spain and actual occupancy of the island of Cuba by the United States. As to the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico, we acquired the title and sovereignty by conquest subsequently ratified and ceded by treaty. We could not stop the title and sovereignty in and over Cuba coming to the United States by our mere declaration contained in the resolutions adopted by Congress April 20, 1898. If the doctrine of the so-called Neeley case be correct, and the United States continue to occupy the island of Cuba, I would like to ask what further is necessary upon the part of the legislative branch of the Government of the United States or of the island of Cuba to convert the island of Cuba, called foreign territory by the so-called Neeley case, into domestic territory? There is only one question decided in the so-called Philippine and Porto Rico cases of interest to us as far as the question now under discussion is concerned, and that is transfer of title and sovereignty and allegiance.

The other question involved and decided by those cases, that legislation must be in conformity to the Constitution, is entirely out of this question as to the relations of the United States with the island of Cuba. As said in the so-called Philippine and Porto Rico cases, the Supreme Court of the United States is unanimous that the title and sovereignty over those islands passed from Spain to the United States, which includes allegiance on the part of the people to the United States instead of Spain. But that court divided in opinion as to how the tariff law of the United States was affected by the condition of affairs, the majority holding that after the treaty and until Congress legislated goods from those islands could reach the United States free of duty—in other words, that those islands were and are domestic territory; the minority holding that after the treaty was ratified and until Congress appropriately legislated, within the meaning of the tariff law, those islands were foreign and duties could be collected the same as before the ratification of the treaty. As a corollary from that the court would have been unanimous that had Congress appropriately legislated, the territory referred to would be domestic. Applying the doctrine of the Philippine and Porto Rico cases to Cuba, the Supreme Court is unanimous that the title and sovereignty of Spain over Cuba passed to the United States; and that court would be unanimous that it is domestic territory if Congress had appropriately legislated.

As this question might, and no doubt will, arise under the tariff law, it might be well to bear in mind that Congress has legislated with reference to Cuba in the act of March 2, 1901. For in that act, to be found in chapter 803, volume 31, United States Statutes at Large, pages 895 and 897, it will be learned that Congress has expressly recognized its control over the island of Cuba and that it is domestic territory within their understanding. For by that act Congress tells the coming government of Cuba what must be done and what must not be done, and that when certain things are done the island of Cuba can go its own way, subject only to interference by the United States under conditions referred to in the act. Independent of this legislation on the part of Congress recognizing that there is no independent government, as the title and the sovereignty over Cuba is in the United States, and that the people owe allegiance to the United States and to no other government, all of the decisions referred to since the Neely case holds, in effect, that no duties can be collected on goods coming from Cuba to the United States since the ratification of the second treaty of Paris, and, to state the question fairly, the minority holding that until Congress legislates duties must be paid; but, as I have just said, Congress has legislated to the extent of recognizing the full power of the United States over Cuba; but leaving the minority out of view, all of the Philippine and Porto Rico cases decided since the Neely case hold that Congressional legislation is not necessary, as title and sovereignty have passed to the United States, as they did in the case of Cuba in the so-called Neely case, for I think I am justified in saying that that case squarely holds that title and sovereignty are in the United States, but in trust only.

The remarks of Mr. Justice White, which I have hereinbefore cited, are especially applicable. What effect temporary occupancy has upon the question of sovereignty, title, and allegiance has no value whatever in this case. If our hostile Army had temporarily occupied all of Cuba, according to the facts and within the doctrine of Fleming against Page, I consider there would be no change in the title or sovereignty or allegiance on the part of the people of the island of Cuba. Upon the withdrawal of our forces the sovereignty and title over Cuba would remain with Spain. No act upon the part of either Government would be necessary to complete the Spanish title. But if our hostile Army took possession of Cuba in the morning and before night of that day there was a cessation of hostilities and a treaty of peace immediately followed, silent as to the disposition of the conquered territory, and our conquering Army remained in possession of the conquered territory, the title and sovereignty would ipso facto pass to the United States, without reference to the length of time our Army occupied the island. How much stronger the case when our hostile Army occupied the island of Cuba and Spain not only withdrew entirely from the island, but by treaty relinquished title and sovereignty and not only permitted the United States to occupy the island, but agreed with the United States that they should occupy the island of Cuba, and by its terms exercise sovereignty over the island and the people thereof. And it is immaterial how long, whether for a short or longer time, the United States is to remain in possession. That question does not in the least affect our title, which was acquired by conquest. Permanency of occupation is only considered to determine whether it has been long enough to operate for the passage of title and transfer of sovereignty, and never considered when the title and sovereignty has absolutely passed by conquest under international law.

The importance of this political question is very great. This nation has started on a new career by obtaining foreign territory through conquest and treaty. After great deliberation and much diversity of opinion the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that title and sovereignty to and over foreign territory can be acquired by this nation by conquest and treaty; that such territory so acquired becomes the property of the United States without any legislation on the part of Congress, and, as I understand it, on this point the court is unanimous, and that the people of the territory so acquired can bring their goods to the United States without paying duty until Congress legislates. If Congress at this time, according to the present legal relations of Cuba to the United States, should refuse to recognize Cuba as domestic territory in the fullest sense of the word and recognize it by its legislation as foreign territory, it will go back on the doctrine and principles of the Republican party and national doctrine that appeals to good sense, and is sustained by every member of international law and declared by the Supreme Court in all of the so-called Philippine and Porto Rico cases, and will virtually overrule that court that we talk so much about following.

We can not relieve ourselves from the responsibility assumed by our declaration of war against Spain, and while politically divided we should unite in the discharge of the great duty before us. Honest men, men who think well of their country, will differ as to the extent of our power, of our rights as a nation, in and to and over the recently acquired territory, and what form of government will be best suited to the people who have come to us with the territory, absolutely unfamiliar with a Republican form of government and at this time totally unfitted for self-government.

But I have no doubts on this question myself, I have every confidence in the judgment, wisdom, and patriotism of the American people, and if the politician and critic will but be patient and fair in action and statement the future of this country will never have any reason to find fault with or regret the disposition of these important questions.

Many of the conditions confronting us are difficult of solution on account of our form of Government, our previous declarations, the insular nature of the territory acquired, and unfitness of the people of those territories to govern themselves. But time, good sense, education, civilization, patience, and patriotism will not only solve them but solve them right, to the credit of the United States, for the welfare of the people interested, and to the satisfaction of the civilized world.

Independent of what the Supreme Court has decided with particular reference to the question under discussion there are a few general principles of law that should be fully studied in order to aid us to better understand the question. With a full statement of law and a complete statement of facts there ought to be no question about coming to a right conclusion. I desire to advance the position that the underlying question in this case is a political one. "Who is the sovereign de jure or de facto of a territory is not a judicial but a political question, the determination of which by the legislative and executive departments of any government conclusively binds the judges, as well as all other officers, citizens, and subjects of that Government. This principle has always been upheld by this court and has been affirmed under a great variety of circumstances," citing a large number of cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. The court then adds, "It is equally well settled in England," citing a large number of cases decided by the leading courts of England. "Jones against The United States (137 U. S. Reports 202, p. 212)." "Patriotic and intelligent men may differ widely as to the desirableness of this or that acquisition, but this is solely a political question. We can only consider this aspect of the case so far as to say that no construction of the Constitution should be adopted which would prevent Congress from considering each case upon its merits unless the language of the instrument imperatively demands it. A false step at this time might be fatal to the development of what Chief Justice Marshall called the American Empire." The opinion of the majority of the court, by Mr. Justice Brown, in Downes v. Bidwell, 244, page 286. It will aid us greatly in this case to correctly understand by the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States what is foreign and what is domestic territory. A foreign country is a country under a sovereignty other than that of the United States. By a foreign port may be understood a port within the dominions of a foreign sovereign and without the dominions of the United States. (Mr. Justice Story in United States v. Heyward, 2 Gall., 501; see also Chief Justice Spencer in King v. Parks, 19 Johns., 375; also Treasury Regulations, 835, approved in Stairs v. Paislee, 18 Howard, 526.)

A foreign country was defined by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall and Mr. Justice Story to be one exclusively within the sovereignty of a foreign nation and without the sovereignty of the United States. (The boat Eliza, 2 Gall., 4; Taber v. United States, 1 Story, 1; the ship Adventure, 1 Brock, 235-241.) Such was the language of the opinion of the court delivered by Mr. Justice Brown in De Lima v. Bidwell (182 U. S., 1, p. 180).

This is a very valuable statement of the law, because within the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States sovereignty is made the test. Ever since the treaty of Paris, Cuba has been exclusively within the sovereignty of the United States and not within the sovereignty of a foreign nation or under its own sovereignty. The judges who dissented from the opinion of the majority in this case relied upon this same definition, for, on page 201 of the same case, the dissenting justices say:

> A foreign country is defined to be, following Chief Justice Marshall, one exclusively within the sovereignty of a foreign nation and without the sovereignty of the United States. This makes sovereignty the test and gives a rule as sure and exact in its application as it is clear and simple in its expression. There is no difficulty in applying it.

Now, apply this rule to the case of Cuba—as I insist the facts justify it—and no one can disagree with me when I say there is no difficulty in applying it. It would rather appear that the court was unanimous on this proposition that sovereignty is the test, and no gentleman can refute the statement that the sovereignty of the United States over Cuba has been sole and supreme since the ratification of the treaty.

It might be said in passing that if Cuba has done anything since the treaty it has been with the express or implied permission of the Government of the United States. If anything has been done by the people of that island independent of the express permission of the United States, all will have to agree that it was subject to the disapproval of the Government of the United States, but when we come to consider that even all of the police regulations in force over the island of Cuba are absolutely under the control of the Government of the United States, exercised through the military arm of the Government of the United States, even to the sweeping and cleaning of the streets, no one for a moment can question but what the sovereignty of the United States is sole, exclusive, and supreme.

It will now become important to inquire how this Government can constitutionally acquire foreign territory. Happily on this question we do not have to go outside of the Supreme Court of the United States for conclusive authority to sustain my views. "By the law of nations recognized by all civilized States dominion of new territory may be acquired by discovery and occupation as well as by cession or conquest." (Jones v. United States, 137 U. S., 202, 212.)

"The Constitution confers absolutely upon the Government of the Union the powers of making war and of making treaties. Consequently that Government possesses the power of acquiring territory either by conquest or by treaty. The territory thus acquired is acquired as absolutely as if the annexation were made, as in the case of Texas and Hawaii, by an act of Congress." (De Lima v. Bidwell, 182 U. S., 195.) "It should be borne in mind that, applying this law to the particular question under discussion, the Supreme Court of the United States practically says that territory acquired by conquest is acquired as absolutely as if it had been acquired by annexation confirmed by an act of Congress."

It may be important in this connection to ascertain how territory is acquired by conquest, and I would respectfully refer the House to that valuable work on international law by Wheaton, third edition, annotated and rewritten by A. C. Boyd, page 708:

> The treaty of peace leaves everything in the state in which it found it unless there be some express stipulation to the contrary. The existing state of possession is maintained except so far as altered by the terms of the treaty. If nothing be said about the conquered country or places, they remain with the conqueror, and his title can not afterwards be called in question.

During the continuance of the war the conqueror in possession has only the usufructuary right and the latent title of the foreign sovereignty continues until the treaty of peace by its silent operation or express provision extinguishes his title forever.

This valuable and clear statement in the text is supported by all of the great writers on international law. Now, consider this law in connection with the facts. The treaty of peace was silent with reference to the question of sovereignty and title; that is, as far as any express disposition of the same were made. But the words of the treaty make the case much stronger in support of my contention, the provisions of the treaty on this subject being as follows:

> Spain relinquished all claim of sovereignty over and title to Cuba, and as the island is, upon the evacuation of Spain, to be occupied by the United States, the United States will, so long as such occupation shall last, assume and discharge the obligations that may under international law result from the fact of its occupation for the protection of life and property.

The case could not have been made any stronger if the treaty had expressly provided that the sovereignty and title of Spain were absolutely transferred to the United States and accepted by this Government.

Spain absolutely and expressly, in terms, relinquished sovereignty and title and recognized fully that both were going to pass to the United States, and the United States realized its obligation and accepted it by obligating itself to assume and discharge the obligations arising under international law. Nothing could be more complete. It more than sustains my contention that the title and sovereignty of Spain over Cuba not only passed to the United States by virtue of international law, but absolutely under the treaty, and I think, as a matter of law and common fairness, any person is justly entitled to insist that this Government obtained title and sovereignty to Cuba by the treaty in addition to the absolute title and right of sovereignty acquired by conquest. Then I am going to insist that my contention is right and sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States that the United States acquired Cuba by conquest and also by cession, and if that contention is correct Cuba is not and can not under any circumstances or under any law, international, constitutional, or under the Supreme Court of the United States, be considered a foreign country.

There was a little authority emanating from the Supreme Court of the United States through the case of Flemming v. Page (9 Howard, 603) against my position, and while unquestionably the case was rightly decided, the reasoning was very unfortunate, and the case has been absolutely overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States in the so-called Philippine and Porto Rico cases. In fact, in my judgment it was not followed by Mr. Chief Justice Taney, who wrote the opinion in Flemming against Page, as Chief Justice Taney was on the Supreme Bench of the United States when Cross against Harrison (16 Howard, 164) was decided, absolutely, in my judgment, overruling the case of Flemming against Page on the very particular question that seemed to interest the Chief Justice so much. At any rate, it is no longer the law or authority. The opinion of the court in De Lima v. Bidwell, on page 186, thoroughly and to the fullest extent sustains my contention.

After discussing at great length the question now occupying my mind, the court says (vol. 182, p. 186):

> It will be seen that the three propositions involve a recognition of the fact that California became domestic territory immediately upon the ratification of the territory.

Of course, the acquisition of California was by treaty; but, as I have been arguing, there is no difference between territory acquired by treaty or by conquest, and the court repudiates the idea that after the ratification of the treaty the acquired territory remains foreign within the meaning of the tariff law until Congress has acted, and on page 194 the court states, as a matter of law:

> That from 1803 to the present time there is not a shred of authority except the dictum in Flemming v. Page, practically overruled in Cross v. Harrison, for holding that a district ceded to and in the possession of the United States remains for any purpose a foreign country.

Now apply that law to the present question. As I am insisting, Cuba was practically ceded to the United States, but whether I am correct or not in regard to this proposition no one can successfully refute the statement that the United States acquired Cuba from Spain by conquest, and that Cuba is now and has been in the possession of the United States ever since the ratification of the treaty. Therefore, within this opinion of the court, how can it be said that for any purpose Cuba remains a foreign country? Whether within the meaning of the tariff act or the law returning Neely to Cuba for trial, particularly as I am arguing that territory can not be both foreign and domestic at the same time, it must be one or the other. At this time I am contenting myself, as I have said, by considering general principles of law that must be understood to properly understand the question now before the House. It will be extremely valuable in this connection to have a thorough familiarity with the so-called Neely case, which has thrown the question before the House into some confusion. Independent of that case there is not a lawyer on earth, familiar with international law, the law of conquest and powers of the United States under the Constitution to acquire foreign territory, but what will say that Cuba is domestic territory as far as the United States is concerned.

The case of Neely v. Henkel is to be found in 180 United States Reports, page 109. The Revised Statutes of the United States, section 5270, provided that when there was a treaty for extradition between the United States and any foreign Government, and it appeared that a person was within the limits of the United States who had committed a crime within the limits of such foreign country, he should be extradited. It was alleged that Neely had committed an offense while in Cuba, and it was thought he could not be extradited under the statutes, so section 5270 was amended by the act of June 6, 1900, which provided that when any foreign country or territory, or any part thereof, is occupied by or under the control of the United States any person who should violate the criminal laws enforced therein and flee from justice there into the United States and should be found therein, should be liable to arrest and detention by the authorities of the United States, and, on the written request of officials named in the act, be returned for trial. The case came into the Supreme Court of the United States on a writ of habeas corpus.

It will be noticed that Congress did not declare that Cuba was a foreign country, but the language of the act is general, referring to foreign country occupied by or under the control of the United States.

Unquestionably Congress could authorize the return of Neely to Cuba without any such provision as the act cited, and the only way in which Congress could rid itself of liability and discharge its duty toward Cuba would be by virtue of its constitutional powers to dispose of the islands. It could not discharge itself of liability and rid itself of its plain duty toward those people by simply stating that Cuba was a foreign country. Hard cases make a shipwreck of principles. The Supreme Court was voicing the unanimous sentiment of the American people, as they wanted Neely tried, and he was returned to Cuba at the expense of the Supreme Court of the United States saying that Cuba was a foreign country within the meaning of the act. The Supreme Court of the United States, to sustain its judgment and conclusion that Neely should go to Cuba for trial on the ground that Cuba was a foreign country, first recited the resolutions of Congress of April 20, 1898, including what the President had said in his various official communications.

Now, in passing I desire to say that it makes no difference what the President of the United States said or says with reference to this question, unless he was or is negotiating a treaty. He could not bind the Congress; he could not prevent title and sovereignty coming to the United States, and he could not divest the United States of its sovereignty and title over Cuba; but the Supreme Court relies upon all of this for the purpose of convincing the country that Cuba was a foreign country, absolutely ignoring international law and the law of conquest and legal effect of our going to war with a foreign power and occupying its territory and having that foreign power relinquish its sovereignty and title and withdraw from the island. I do not think for a moment it takes argument to show that, including the resolutions of April 20, 1898, and all that the President has said, would prevent the operation of law. That court in this case states clearly that it is for Congress to say when this occupation must cease. This is an absolute statement on the part of the court, that we are occupying that island. If we are occupying it we have dominion over it, and if our sovereignty is there under the test referred to, it certainly must be domestic territory. What stronger assertion of our sovereignty over that island can be made than the statement of the court on page 115—

> That at the date of the act of June 6, 1900, the island of Cuba was occupied by and was under the control of the United States, and that it is still so occupied and controlled can not be disputed. This court will take judicial notice that such were, at the date named, and are now the relations between this country and Cuba.

Under this statement what becomes of sovereignty? Here is a judicial declaration on the part of the Supreme Court that the relations between this country and Cuba are such that we are occupying it, and the island is under the control of the United States. This is sovereignty. And, as I say again, if sovereignty is the test, it is domestic and not foreign territory. Now, the Supreme Court, at great length, recites all that was done by this Government after taking possession of the island of Cuba. Pursuant to the authority of the President, a military governor was appointed. The governor took absolute supreme control of the island in the name of the United States, organized a civil government, and divided it into four departments, each under the charge of a secretary. Civil and criminal courts, with jurisdiction defined were created, and postal code promulgated and criminal laws enacted, Cuba powerless, the Government of the United States in supreme and absolute control, and yet gentlemen are heard to say that Cuba is a foreign territory. With all due respect to the court, no one will ever be satisfied by the reasoning employed by the court that Cuba has been a foreign country since the ratification of the treaty; but the Supreme Court in this case more than sustains my contention. Let me read from page 120 of the opinion:

> It is true that as between Spain and the United States—indeed, as between the United States and all foreign nations—Cuba, upon the cessation of hostilities with Spain and after the treaty of Paris, was to be treated as if it were conquered territory; but as between the United States and Cuba, that island is territory held in trust for the inhabitants of Cuba, to whom it rightfully belongs and to whose exclusive control it will be surrendered when a stable government shall have been established by their voluntary action.

There are several things to be considered in connection with this opinion of the court. I do not know by what authority the Supreme Court is speaking for Congress. The court has gone far out of its way to see that the exclusive control of this government will be surrendered by the United States when a stable government shall have been established by the voluntary action of the people of Cuba. Here is an authority for the contention that Cuba has no sovereignty; but, if I read the signs rightly, there is no thought on the part of the United States to surrender exclusive control of this island of Cuba.

It is in contemplation that we shall keep a part of it and that our troops shall remain on the island, and instead of their being permitted to erect a stable government by their voluntary action we have by the act of March 2, 1901, forced upon them a government or elements of a government, and the careful reading of this act will show that it is not the intention of the Government of the United States to allow the people of Cuba to establish a government by their voluntary action. It is for Congress to say what the duties of the American people under all circumstances are to the people of Cuba, and it will be for Congress to say when the powers of the United States shall be surrendered and to whom. The citation from the opinion sustains my contention that the sovereignty and title to Cuba are in the United States, for the Supreme Court says so when they say that the United States is holding this territory in trust. It is only a case of hairsplitting now between my position and that of the Supreme Court of the United States. I am insisting that the title and sovereignty over Cuba are the United States.

The Supreme Court of the United States assents to this position, but says we are holding it in trust. I insist that we are not holding it in trust, but that if we are holding it in trust, as I have said, it will take an act of Congress to divest the title and sovereignty of the United States, and in this I am confirmed by the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States. It will be interesting for a moment to look into this question of trusts. I would like any legal gentleman, when he lectures on trusts to a law school, to give this case to the class as an illustration of a trust. There is not an element of trust under any law of trust, and I am not begging the question for a moment when I say so. It certainly can not be an express trust, because there was no agreement entered into on the part of the United States with any one. If it was an express trust the ownership and the sovereignty would have to be conferred by Spain on the United States, coupled with a trust which would provide how long the United States was to hold the title and at what time and upon what terms and conditions it would have to surrender it.

The trust would have to be created by the parties or else it would have to arise by a presumption of law, and the trust must be accepted by the United States as trustee. It is a waste of time to argue that there was any trust. It is doubtful whether the island of Cuba could be a cestui que trust; but even assuming that the beneficiary was certain and definite enough to be benefited by the trust, it could not be a trust under any law either expressed or implied. Certainly no one can claim for a moment that there was any element of an express trust. It certainly could not be implied, as it was not a resulting trust or a constructive trust. If Mr. A delivered the purchase price of a piece of land to Mr. B, who took the title, a trust would result in favor of A as against B. If Mr. A conveyed his property to B in fraud of creditors a constructive trust would arise in favor of the creditors of A. Now, then, there is perfect accord between the Supreme Court and myself as far as this contention is concerned, to the effect that the title and sovereignty of Cuba is in the United States, but in trust, we will say. If that is true, it certainly is domestic territory and not foreign territory, and I know there is not a lawyer in the United States of lesser or greater ability who will say upon the facts that there is a single element of a trust. But whether there is or not it is going to take an act of Congress to transfer title and sovereignty, and that act of Congress has not passed.

Instead of determining the question by conquest under international law the court determined it by what they declare to be an avowed object intended to be accomplished by the war with Spain and the military occupation of Cuba. This is not the test, as I have stated, and in addition thereto our declaration of intention could not, under international law, prevent the passing of title and transfer of sovereignty and allegiance. Declarations made by no one, acted on by no one, can not, I submit, by universal law, prevent the acquisition of foreign territory by conquest. There is no difference, in legal effect, between acquisition of foreign territory by conquest or treaty. In both cases there must be occupation by the new owner to make a perfect title. The treaty of Paris found the island of Cuba in the occupancy of the United States, and it was left in the state in which it was when the treaty was completed. The treaty made no provision for the return of the island of Cuba to Spain or to convey it to Cuba then or at any future time. Therefore, in accordance with universal principles of international law, title and sovereignty of the island passed to the United States—not in trust, but absolutely—and the allegiance of the people of that island was transferred from Spain to the United States, and the title of this nation can not be called in question. The Neely case holds Cuba to be foreign territory because of our declaration and the official statement of the President, while on the same principles of law the dissent in the subsequent cases in the same court in effect declare Cuba to be foreign territory because Congress had not legislated with reference to the island, while the majority opinion and opinion of the court make Cuba domestic territory because we are exercising sovereignty over the island pursuant to our right obtained by conquest.

The court further sustains my position, on page 121, in the following language: "It can not be doubted that when the United States enforced the relinquishment by Spain of her sovereignty in Cuba and determined to occupy and control that island until there was complete tranquillity in all its borders and until the people of Cuba had created for themselves a stable government it succeeded to the authority of the displaced Government, so far, at least, that it became its duty under international law and pending the pacification of the island to protect, in all appropriate legal modes, the lives, the liberty, and property of all those who submit to the authority of the representatives of this country." Here is an absolute acknowledgment on the part of the court that the United States succeeded to all that Spain had enjoyed, which was sovereignty, title, and the allegiance of the people. Up to this time Cuba has not created a stable government. Therefore am I not right when I insist that Cuba is domestic territory until Congress has legislated pursuant to its powers under the Constitution?

The question of allegiance is an important one. This Government can not afford to shut its eyes to the rights of these people. If nothing further is done by this Government than has been indicated, or what I may say is now in sight, no provision whatever is made for those people in the island of Cuba that desire to become citizens of the United States. At present every single person in the island of Cuba, outside of those who absolutely belong to other governments, owe their allegiance to the United States, and that must be transferred by an act of Congress. [Loud applause.]

[Mr. GAINES of West Virginia addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARNER] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I am influenced in my opinion and action on this question only by what I consider the best interests of the district I represent, the Republican party, and the whole people of the United States. I have no pride of opinion, and have a respect for the opinion of all with whom I am unable to agree, and, having given the question the best consideration of which I am capable, I am compelled to satisfy my own conscience and act on my own convictions.

The district I represent—the central district of Illinois—is strictly an agricultural one, and our farmers during all these years have faithfully supported the party favoring a protective tariff and have cheerfully paid a bounty to the producers of many articles they consume but do not produce, because they were of opinion it was best for the whole people. While they do not produce a single board, nail, or pane of glass used in their buildings, or an ounce of steel used in their beams, bridges, and machinery, they have cheerfully indorsed a protective tariff which enables the lumberman of the State of Washington to ship his lumber 2,500 miles by rail and sell it to them at a profit, while if it were not for the tariff on lumber they could purchase it at a much smaller price from the Canadian lumberman, only 400 miles away.

They have supported a tariff which has made the otherwise worthless and barren hills of Pennsylvania valuable property, and which has given good wages to the laborers and profits to the manufacturers of other States; and while, until the last two or three years, they have not produced any sugar-yielding product, they have uncomplainingly sustained the tariff that has made sugar raising in the South possible. They have loyally supported the party that has pledged itself to encourage, protect, and make profitable home industries and dignify American labor, and have done so under the impression and belief that protection would be extended impartially to all sections and industries of the United States

They have refused to listen to any proposition to "tinker with the tariff," lest it endanger the entire fabric, and they are now opposed to a tinkering with it that strikes at a new industry of their own.

They wish diversified uses of their soil. They wish a diversity of valuable and profitable crops, and they do not wish this new product they have just commenced raising stricken down, but whatever you may do they will remain true to the principle of protection, because they believe it to be to the best interest of all.

They and I believe in reciprocity, but by reciprocity we understand the admission into this country free of duty, or at a reduced duty, the product of another country not produced by us, in consideration that that country will admit free of duty, or at a reduced duty, some product of ours—this in order that we may obtain a higher price for our article, and that we may obtain their article at a less price than we should otherwise be compelled to pay. But I have never understood reciprocity to mean that foreign-produced articles might be brought into this country to compete with our own products unless the loss be made good to our producers by a bounty on their product. In protecting the product we protect the labor that produces it.

The gentlemen supporting and urging this measure are assuming a tremendous responsibility, and I respectfully suggest that they abandon it and let well enough alone. I submit that it is not on Republican lines or within Republican principles, and I am of opinion that a large majority of the Republicans in this House are at heart against it. [Applause.]

We are enjoying the greatest prosperity in our history, and our future is bright. We owe it all to our protective tariff and our gold standard, to the protection and encouragement of our own industries and our determination to be honest and have our credit the best. Let us stand by those principles and guide our course by that chart.

Take a single brick out of the wall and it may topple and fall. Allow a single break, however small, in the embankment and it all may be swept away. Do not tinker with the tariff. Let well enough alone.

I am not in favor of special legislation. I am not fond of crazy quilts. I favor general principles and consistency. It is not safe to navigate a ship by a compass that does not always point in the same direction.

If this measure carries we shall have no fixed policy in relation to protecting American industries and American labor, and we shall not be able to judge by what we have done to-day what we will do to-morrow.

It is not claimed by anyone that a reduction of 20 per cent of the tariff on Cuban sugar will lessen the cost to the American consumer 1 cent on a thousand pounds of the article, or that it will ever benefit the Cuban sugar grower more than 7 per cent of the reduction, and it is admitted by all that the sugar trust will receive the benefit of at least the other 13 per cent. I do not believe that it will benefit the Cuban sugar grower at all, and the passage of the bill will divert from the United States Treasury this year alone $8,000,000, and pour it into the coffers of the American Sugar Refining Company, and the amount will grow annually as long as the reduction lasts.

That such is the opinion of the trust itself is shown by the fact that its stock has gone up and down with the prospects of the success or failure of the bill. Certain it is that the trust now controls all the Cuban sugar that will be ready for the market for more than one year from this time.

The sugar trust will not favor anything that will benefit the American consumers, and why should the representatives of the American consumers favor a measure that will benefit the trust alone, and deprive the Government of a revenue of at least $8,000,000 per year, which must be made good by the American consumers in some other way.

The supporters of this measure are substantially driven to urge as their only reason for its passage that we owe it as a duty to Cuba; that the Cubans are suffering, and we must come to their help. A sympathetic appeal.

I deny that we owe Cuba any duty whatever, and I deny that the Cubans are suffering for anything they could not get if they were willing to work, as we do here in America.

We have done and promised to do more for Cuba than any nation has ever done for any other country in the world and more than she had or has any right to ask. With our ships and guns and men and money we won and gave her freedom and independence. We freed her from the Spanish yoke and an indebtedness of $300,000,000, and we will start her on her independent career as a sovereign nation with a clean sheet and good bank account, and in a better financial condition than is our own country. [Applause.] Further, we paid her own men for fighting for their own liberty; we will protect her from all foreign invasions without the cost of a penny to her, and we may be liable for $59,000,000 of Cuban war claims already filed. It will not be necessary for her to maintain a single vessel of war or regiment of men to protect herself from without, as the entire American Army, Navy, and Treasury will forever stand between her and any foreign foe. [Applause.]

What more should she ask? What more should we give? Suffering Cuba! Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota has shown us that her per capita money, even immediately after her long and expensive war, was greater than that of the United States, and that is easily accounted for by the fact that more money per acre has been, is, and can be produced from her soil than is or can be produced from that of any other country of which we have any knowledge.

The evidence before the Ways and Means Committee shows that farm employment in Cuba is begging for labor at higher wages than are paid in the United States, and that the cost of living is less; that 60,000 laborers have been brought into the island since peace was declared, and that 300,000 more are demanded by the needs of its fields and factories. With such a demand labor commands its own price.

For the purpose of ascertaining whether the Cuban planter is farming his land at a profit or loss, and whether in fact he needs help, much time has been consumed in this discussion in attempting to analyze the testimony given before the Ways and Means Committee on the question as to the cost of producing, ready for the market, one pound of sugar, and the results arrived at are somewhat conflicting and unsatisfactory, and, in my opinion, immaterial. The question for us to consider is whether the cane grower, the Cuban farmer, is receiving a remunerative price for his crop. Whether he is receiving, under existing conditions, a fair remuneration for his labor and his investment in his land and how it compares with that received by the American farmer, and that is easily settled, and to the effect that if either is entitled to help from our Government and sympathy it is the American.

In my district and State corn is the main or staple crop, as cane is the main or staple crop in Cuba. The average market value of corn land in Illinois is $100 per acre. In Cuba cane land can be purchased at an average price of $50 per acre. In order to raise corn in Illinois it is necessary, in addition to the land, wagons, and agricultural implements, for the farmer to have, keep, and feed, substantially the year around, teams of horses with which to plant, cultivate, and market his crop. In order to make and market his crop he must each year plow his land, then harrow it, then furnish and plant his seed, then harrow it in, then plow the land, cultivating his corn at least twice again, then gather the corn, ear by ear, from the standing stalk and throw it into a wagon and haul it to and throw it into his cribs. Afterwards he shells it at an expense of at least 1 cent per bushel and hauls it by wagon an average distance of 4 miles to market and sells it at an average price of 35 cents per bushel.

The average yield per acre of corn is 50 bushels, and the Illinois farmer therefore receives for the use of his land, teams, and agricultural implements, on all of which he is required to pay taxes, and for his labor, $17.50 per year for each acre he cultivates.

How is it with our suffering Cuban farmer, for whom some of us are now so copiously shedding tears? He clears his land and plants his cane on an average of only once in ten years. The cane is indigenous to the soil and is never cultivated, and to plant it it is only necessary to stick the joints in the ground. It requires and receives no more cultivation than our blue grass, and for ten years after it is planted the Cuban farmer merely cuts his cane once each year, throws it into a cart, hauls it not more than 2½ miles to the little railroad, owned and operated by the mill owner, and receives his pay for it. And how much does he receive per acre per year for his product, the use of his $50-an-acre land, on which he is not required to pay any taxes, and for his next to no labor?

The evidence is that the average yield of sugar cane in Cuba is 56,000 pounds per acre; that the cane yields 10 per cent of its weight in sugar; that the average price of sugar at the port in Cuba from which it is exported is 2½ cents per pound; that the mill owner who receives and grinds the cane, while in theory he retains one-half of what he grinds as his toll, in fact purchases the cane, and on its delivery to him pays the planter the then market price of sugar for the one-half it is estimated the cane will produce. That is 10 per cent of the weight of the cane. The acre of cane weighs 56,000 pounds. It will yield in sugar 10 per cent of its weight, or 5,600 pounds. The sugar is worth 2½ cents per pound and the yield of the acre of land is worth $134.40, of which the poor suffering Cuban farmer receives one-half, or $67.20. Sixty-seven dollars and 20 cents per acre per year for planting a crop on $50-an-acre land once in ten years, and then simply letting it grow and cutting it with a corn knife once each year. Is it any wonder that the money per capita, even immediately after its expensive war, was so much greater in Cuba than in the United States? Is it any wonder that they have imported into Cuba since the declaration of peace 60,000 cheap laborers principally from Spain, and wish to import 300,000 more?

The Cuban cane grower gets out of his untaxed land, with but little labor, $67.20 per acre per year, and the American corn grower realizes, upon his $100-per-acre land and for his almost continuous labor, only $17.50 per acre per year. Which is entitled to our sympathy and which is entitled to our help?

If this bill should be amended so as to give the American farmer a bounty of $1 per bushel on each bushel of corn he raises, so as to make his acre of land yield him yearly $67.50, we would place him more nearly on an equality with the Cuban planter and I might possibly consider the advisability of supporting it. [Applause.]

On this showing the American farmer, if any, is entitled to our help, and charity should begin at home. [Applause.]

The Cuban soil is the most productive on earth, and the Cuban planter receives larger returns for his capital invested and labor performed than any other in the world, and the pretense of suffering Cuba is the mask behind which the sugar trust is seeking to destroy the beet-sugar industry and in addition obtain over $8,000,000 per year that should be collected for the benefit of the people of the United States, and the question is whether this Congress will enable the trust to be successful in its attempt. And my vote shall be in the negative. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, either the bill before the House or something connected with the bill has had a remarkable effect upon a good many of those who have addressed the House in this debate, for nearly every one who has spoken has found that his own contemplated action and vote will be in thorough harmony with the platforms and principles of his party.

Republicans who favor this measure are very clear and emphatic in the statement that it is projected along the lines of protection and is to be a stay and support to that doctrine. Republicans who oppose it are very confident that the bill, if not designed for that purpose, will in effect undermine the protection wall; and, as persons devoted to the doctrine of protection and to the principles of the Republican party as declared in its platforms, they feel constrained to oppose the bill.

Upon this side, too, we find a number of those who support the bill, happy in the consciousness that it is a Democratic measure or one leading in the direction of Democracy—one following the lines marked out by the Democratic party. Likewise, we find upon this side members who oppose the bill, solely and exclusively because it is contrary, according to their ideas of things, to the previous declarations and all the abiding principles of their party. Viewed from all these several standpoints, this is a most interesting piece of legislation. Throwing all these various estimates into hotchpotch and trying to derive some conclusion from the aggregate, this may be fairly classed as rather a remarkable brochure in legislation.

I will not endeavor to ascertain, much less to inform the House, just how this bill should be classified, since so many know, as they have confessed, just precisely under what heading or category it should be placed. It is entitled "A bill to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba," conceding to that republic soon to be a reduction of 20 per cent on the rates of the Dingley tariff bill upon articles imported from that island to our Republic, and of course securing in return the like concession from the republic of Cuba, in the way of a reduction of duties upon articles exported from this country into that.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who delivered a very elaborate discourse upon this subject, stated what was, I think, a matter of common information, but what I had not before heard proclaimed ex cathedra from a Republican source so eminent, that when the Dingley law was passed it was known that the duty placed upon sugar was excessively high; that the gentleman, once a distinguished member of this House and whose name is linked with that tariff legislation—Mr. Dingley—recognized the duty as unreasonably and unnecessarily high, and was therefore opposed to the rate adopted. But the sugar trust was rapacious and inexorable. The sugar trust demanded the excessively high duty of the Dingley law and would be content with nothing less; and obediently, if somewhat reluctantly and somewhat doubtfully, the party in power acceded, as it has done more than once, and will do more than once again, to the demand of this mighty force in business and in politics.

A so-called argument, advanced repeatedly upon this measure, is based upon the assumption that whatever the protective tariff duty is, it is right; no matter how high it is, no matter how the figures came to be placed where they are, no matter what sinister influences were involved or what mighty agencies were powerful enough to control; that the protective tariff law once made, the protection wall once erected, there must be no interference, except, as some gentlemen say, "by its friends." The wall is raised to the height which special interests prescribe for the benefit of special interests, and then when the question of lowering the wall, in whole or in part, arises, we are told that the friends who constructed it, the friends who desire it maintained, the friends who have erected trusts behind it, the friends who have prospered and profited by it, that they must determine whether there shall be any lowering of the wall, and if so, to what extent.

What the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] stated with reference to the duty upon sugar, he might also, had it suited his purpose, have stated with reference to a good many other articles. Beyond all question, clear as sunlight to the perception of anyone who desires to see or who will see, it is evident that the duty placed upon many other articles by that Dingley law of 1897 was when the law was passed, has been ever since, and is now and will be until the duty is lowered, too high. Five years have gone by since that law was passed. Why is it that these "friends of protection," these persons who claim for themselves a monopoly of tariff legislation, have not seen proper to correct some of the inequalities, to remove some of the abuses, to undo some of the wrongs of this Dingley tariff legislation? When will they act? The gentleman from Ohio left it to be inferred by the credulous that some time, to some extent, in some way, these friends of protection will lower the protection wall. When? When? Why not now?

A gentleman of this House, who has received considerable advertising and considerable notoriety in connection with the bill introduced by him, proposed by that bill—only proposed—to take the duties off certain products of steel and iron. I refer to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK]. For a number of months we read in the papers, here and there and everywhere, about what Mr. BABCOCK said and about what Mr. BABCOCK thought of doing and about what Mr. BABCOCK probably would do in reference to the bill which he introduced. All this finally has ended by Mr. BABCOCK in committee voting against the incorporation of his bill into the bill now pending. His bill, I presume, has accomplished and is in process of accomplishing the objects for which it was introduced. Of course I do not know definitely what those objects are or were, and I do not pretend to state precisely and exactly. There is a supposition, quite well founded, I think, and quite generally entertained, I also believe, that possibly two objects, and certainly one, influenced this gentleman in his "reform" movement.

One purpose clearly and plainly, it would seem, was and is to "hold up" the steel trust and kindred trusts for the benefit of the party of the gentleman in the coming campaign; and I see that, contrary to predictions and announcements in the other direction, the gentleman is now at the head of the machine and in control of the machinery for collecting and disbursing funds with a view to perpetuating the power of the party now in control of the Government. If that is one of the purposes of the bill—I will not say it is not the chief one—perhaps the gentleman himself or some other gentleman in his confidence will inform the House what some of the others are. That it never was intended, either by the gentleman who introduced it or by certain ones of those who assumed to favor it, to urge or pass the Babcock bill is too evident to need proof. Everything tends to the conclusion; nothing contradicts it or throws doubt upon it. It is possible—I am not acquainted as to the facts—that a condition exists in the gentleman's own district making it a wise and prudent thing from a political standpoint for him to introduce and pose as a friend of such a tariff-revision bill. I do not know how that is.

There may be something even beyond that. There may be a use of the bill for local consumption relative to interests in the gentleman's own district; the further use of the bill as a means to get money for campaign purposes, and possibly a still further use, to derive benefits not so generally disseminated, but more concentrated, and having a greater personal interest. At all events, it is clear that the bill was not introduced to be passed. It is clear that the gentleman who introduced it is not in favor of it. It is clear that it is a piece of bunko work. The only thing that remains to be determined—and time will settle that—is whether it will accomplish the purpose of securing a good campaign fund, and whether the people of the district represented by the gentleman, if they take an interest in the tariff question, are so easily gulled and love so to be duped that the gentleman may pose before them as in favor of doing that which his bill purports to be designed to do, but which, I think, he never meant to do, never tried to do, and will not try to do.

There has been a good deal said in this discussion about the sugar trust, and it is very refreshing to the average American citizen, and especially to one with a "sweet tooth," to realize how perfectly united we are in speech in our hostility to the sugar trust. The sugar trust, according to the talk we have heard, has not a friend upon the floor; no agency in all this wide world so forlorn and so friendless as the sugar trust in the House of Representatives. That is according to the talk we have heard.

Fortunately there will be an opportunity a little later on for these friends of the people, these violent and extreme and irreconcilable opponents of the sugar trust, to show where they stand and furnish some evidence that they have not misrepresented themselves and their own sentiments.

This proposition now before the House, as I have before stated, is to reduce the duty upon articles going to Cuba and articles coming from Cuba—articles the subject of commerce between that country and this—to the extent of 20 per cent of the Dingley rates and of the Cuban rates, respectively. Cuba produces raw sugar and has no refineries. It is said that taking off 20 per cent of the duty on sugar is simply playing into the hands of the trust; that it is doing nothing for the Cuban planter; that the Cubans will get no good out of it, and that the trust will pocket the 20 per cent reduction. That question has been discussed at considerable length, and with varying degrees of information and learning and assumption. I will not consume time upon it. It would seem to me, however, as suggested by different gentlemen who have discoursed upon this phase of the question, that if raw sugar coming from Cuba has now to pay a certain duty, and after the passage of this law will have to pay but four-fifths of that duty, the persons owning that sugar, the persons producing that sugar, will get into the American market upon better terms, and will be enabled to make more out of their sugar than if the duty remains what it is now. If this suggestion be not sound, perhaps raising the duty 20 per cent would have no effect upon the Cuban planter or the American consumer, but would merely be hurting the sugar trust.

I am one of those who believe with the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN], who made a very thoughtful, very fair, and very able presentation of this question, that instead of being a reduction of 20 per cent there ought to be a reduction of 40 or 50 per cent. I believe that humanity and justice and public policy and, broadly speaking, the interests of our own people demand and require that we should make a reasonable concession, a far larger concession than is made in this bill to the sugar producers of Cuba. I believe, too, with my colleague [Mr. COCHRAN], who ably addressed the House yesterday, that with as rich soil as lies anywhere under the sunshine, with as industrious and inventive a people as the world ever knew, we are prepared here in the United States to raise the sugar beet and to produce sugar in open competition with any people in the wide world.

Somehow this protection doctrine—and I am not going into a discussion of protection—has peculiar effects. Start an industry in a community, having a duty laid upon articles like unto those which are produced in that particular seat of industry, and straightway it is proclaimed by all those interested in that establishment—and the information is disseminated around in an ever-widening circle—that that industry depends upon that duty; that any taking off of the duty is an injury to that industry, and that a considerable reduction of the duty is death to it. Those who become saturated with that idea, those who become influenced by the belief that votes will be controlled by that idea, feel that however they stand with reference to other things, whatever their position upon the general tariff schedule, as to that particular industry, an "infant," of course, always an infant—an infant at 1 year of age, an infant when a century has marked its progress and its triumph—they must clamor for protection; that industry must be protected, and well protected. In order to secure protection for that infant, it is necessary to cooperate with somebody in some other quarter who has another infant, an infant also clamoring for protection, and, according to the infant, needing protection, without any reference to its age, its strength, or its power. Thus the infants combine and the public suffers.

The strongest indictment that can be brought against protection is found in what we behold here now. The most severe arraignment of it, in sentiment and in the history of our American politics, is that found in the fact that the protectionists, for some reason satisfactory to themselves, are unwilling, utterly unwilling, to remove wholly or in part the duty from articles such as are produced in this country cheaper and better than they can be produced anywhere else in the world, and are shipped out and sold abroad in large quantities. Now, why is that? One of two conclusions must be drawn respecting it. It is either a willful disregard of public duty, a willful disregard of the rights and interests of our constituents, a willful subservience to the trusts, for the benefit of the trusts and for the benefit of the party that fosters the trusts, or it is a concession, at once powerful and irresistible, that protection is maintained by a combination not of rights but of greed, and will be endangered if investigated; that revision of the tariff must of necessity be dangerous, not to just protection or reasonable protection, if there be such, not to such protection as can hope to stand upon protection's own ground, but dangerous to vicious protection as a whole, to interfere with any part of it.

Take the steel trust and its products of to-day—a mighty organization, powerful in commercial and political circles in this country, and a mighty factor in the world's trade and commerce. Why does the duty remain upon products such as are turned out by this colossus, this great manufacturing and financial giant, the steel trust? Why? Why? Who can answer? Somebody answers, "We will reform the tariff in due time. It must be reformed by its friends." I say the tariff must be reformed by the friends of the American people. [Applause.] Too many of the friends of protection, in too many instances, are held, wittingly or unwittingly, freely and gladly, or under compulsion and restraint, or haltingly, to the service of the trusts, those huge combinations, the powerful, overshadowing menace to the welfare of all lesser interests and to the American public.

There will be offered in the progress of this measure sundry amendments designed to affect favorably the welfare of the American people, and so reasonable and so remote from an interference with any protection which can claim any merit that they can not be rated as injurious to it, and can not affect at all the general question of protection or free trade. But it will be claimed that these amendments are out of order, not germane. If so, then will come the most beautiful object lessons imaginable. The rules of the House, adopted without consideration, taken in the lump, gulped down, made and employed to prevent—instead of promoting—due consideration, free discussion, and wholesome action, may be relied upon to shield the trusts. Neither rules nor rulings can do it if gentlemen in this House make good their professions.

Of right, the tariff should now be reduced upon more articles than one. Such reduction can be made by amending the pending bill. One amendment would remove the present trust differential duty on sugar. There is a chance to strike the sugar trust. Who is going to vote against taking it off? Who is going to quibble against having an opportunity to vote upon that proposition?

If that differential duty be taken off, if there be an amendment eliminating the Dutch standard in color, designed solely for the benefit of the sugar trust, a benefit to nobody but the trust, substantial justice will be done to the people. When amendments are offered to effect this reform, if the ruling be against their admissibility, then will any man, free from sugar trust influences, sustain that ruling, when he has the opportunity to strike a blow either for the sugar trust or for the people, for the American consumer and the American taxpayer? [Loud applause.] I do not believe in disorder in the House or elsewhere. I do not believe in the utter and complete disregard of the rules; but when a little cobweb of a rule, a little rule that is a trifle, a rule adopted without thought, without consideration, and blindly, can be brushed aside, I shall not hesitate. As to a rule or ruling standing in the way of a mighty reform, standing in the way to prevent the striking of an effective blow at a mighty trust, standing in the way of carrying relief to tens of millions of American citizens, for my part I must withhold my respect either for the judgment or the honesty of the gentleman who has so little regard for reform as to support such a rule or ruling.

If one of these amendments to benefit the people, striking an effective blow at the trusts, shall be declared out of order—I sincerely hope it may not be—it only remains for the House to say whether that little rule or little ruling shall stand aside, the cobweb be blown away, the film vanish. Here is a question of the right of the American people, and the House must determine it, as it has the right to do—determine whether in this particular matter, at this particular time, it shall bow in blind obedience to a little rule, or ruling, or arise in the majestic manhood befitting in American Representatives, and vote and act for the American people. And after all this is over, after this debate shall have closed, after the bill shall have been voted upon, let no man try to shelter himself behind a flimsy rule. You are for the sugar trust or you are going to remove that trust differential duty and that trust Dutch standard limitation in color from the sugar tariff. You are for or you are against these amendments. Do not say that a rule or a ruling is in your way.

Now is your chance for something of needed tariff reform; you will not have another during this Congress. This bill opens the way and now is your opportunity. Who hopes there will be another opportunity during the life of this Congress? No one. Vote for the amendments by voting against any ruling that would prevent you from voting upon them, or go back to your constituents and say, "I voted for the sugar trust, but I spoke against it. I proclaimed my devotion to the American people and the American farmer in particular, but I voted and stood for the sugar trust." The record must be made plain and clear. The question is too great, the issue is too mighty, the distinction is too plain for quibbles. It is the sugar trust on the one side and the American people on the other.

This applies not only to this particular question, not only to sugar, but to other articles. What man can give a reason for sustaining the monopoly that makes every little newspaper publisher in the land pay more for his paper than it is worth in order to make richer and richer the mighty trusts that controls wood pulp and its products? Who gives any reason in support of it? Who dares argue it, or will rise up and align himself in opposition to the demand, oft repeated and as often denied, for justice, for fair play, for the readers of newspapers and the makers of newspapers, as against the few trusts that stand on the other side?

Now, then, do not stop with saying, "Oh, yes; I would like to support that; I wish to get rid of these trusts; yes, indeed; these infernal combinations—I would like to get rid of them all; I am hostile to them to the death." Do not try to hide behind a ruling. Do not whine, "Oh, there is a rule, or a ruling, don't you understand, and I can't go against that." Or, if you will, say to your constituents by deeds more eloquent than words, "Keep on paying more than enough for your sugar; keep on paying more for your barbed wire and your cotton ties and a hundred and one articles manufactured in this country and sold abroad cheaper than they are sold here—manufactured here cheaper than anywhere else in the wide world. Keep on paying more; build up the trusts stronger; make them mightier; increase their power to corrupt politics with their ill-gotten wealth. Bear it all because a rule or a ruling stood in the way of your devoted Representative, who sought long and arduously for a way in which he might relieve you, and when he came up against a little cobweb of a rule, a little film of a ruling, what could he do? Paralyzed! Paralyzed! The will was good; the desire was strong; but the obstacle was insurmountable." [Laughter and applause.]

I am very glad that this bill has come before the House; not that I like the bill as it is. I would have it a much better bill, by having the concession much larger. I am glad it has come before us, because it is an object lesson, because it carries with it an opportunity, because it will enable us and the country to determine who are the friends of the people and who are the friends of the trusts. It will show the people where their representatives belong. Talk, proclamations, denunciations, all these things will go for little, provided they are not the way the vote is cast.

I understand there is going to be an effort to cut off amendment by moving the previous question. There may come the final test. For one, I am opposed to it. I am willing to vote upon any amendment and every amendment that any gentleman chooses to offer. If I am not for, I am against. I may be mistaken about it, but I will not dodge it, and no little film of a rule will stand in my way. So far as my feeble power may extend, I shall try to do what ought to be done.

Let us have no gag business—no shutting off of the power of amendment. Let us once enjoy the privilege, so rare and uncommon in this House, of having a free debate and an opportunity to amend propositions. Let us improve these opportunities. This applies just as well and just as forcibly to Representatives upon the one side of the aisle as upon the other. This need not be a political question. There is nobody here and now trying to wage war against protection or to exploit free trade.

The opportunity has come, and the effort will be to accomplish a measure of justice to the American people; to strike, not a vicious blow at trusts or organized wealth or power, but to strike a blow made necessary by the public interests; to strike it openly and boldly and, if possible, with effect. He that is not for the people now is against them, and the opportunity will be given, the opportunity can not be evaded, of determining upon which side he is. If an amendment be offered, and if a ruling be against it, and if an appeal be taken against the ruling, the man who votes to sustain the Chair, the man who votes to stand by a rule or ruling trivial and transitory upon a question mighty and enduring, will stand in history, will stand before his constituents, will stand before this House, as opposed to the amendment which he refuses to consider; and the man who votes, in that case, to overrule the ruling or to overstep a trivial little rule in order that he may vote upon the amendment will stand as favoring the amendment. The record will be made up, and the American people will judge. [Applause.]

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I confess that it is with a decided degree of hesitation that I enter the arena of this debate—an arena that has been illuminated by the eloquence and ability of gentlemen older in years, and of greater wisdom and experience than myself. It is also with a decided degree of hesitation that I differ in judgment and part company from the distinguished members of the Ways and Means Committee, for whom I have a profound admiration and a high regard.

Added to that natural embarrassment I am also suffering under the personal inconvenience of a recent and highly successful vaccination operation. I first looked upon this as unfortunate, but upon further consideration I regard it as a highly happy circumstance; because, since a free-trade epidemic has broken out on the Republican side of this House, there is no telling the germs of what political idiocy or devastating malady a man is likely to become afflicted with in this Chamber. [Laughter and applause.] Take my advice, my friends, and protect yourselves while there is yet time. I will, however, cheerfully undergo what slight personal inconvenience and discomfiture there may be in the delivery of these few remarks, and will be happy if I can add my mite to what I conceive to be a patriotic endeavor in this Chamber to prevent an American industry from becoming inoculated with the deadly and destructive virus that I conceive to be concealed in the tail of this pending measure. [Laughter and applause.]

At the very outset of our deliberations upon this measure we are confronted with the question, How did this measure in its present form get into this House? When this agitation began, the fact was apparent to everybody that a majority of one side of this Chamber at least was opposed to it.

Since that time no new facts have come to light to shed luster on this proposition. There has been no change in the condition of the Cuban. There has been no change in the condition of the American cane and beet sugar producer. But, wonderful to tell, without any change in the subject-matter of the controversy or the parties thereto, there has been a mighty change in the attitude of many toward this bill. How was this mighty change wrought? Why, it came about through a series of five prolonged, splendid, enthusiastic, highly harmonious, and remarkably effective conferences, did it not?

FAMOUS SUGAR CONFERENCE.

There was a certain so-called Republican conference, a continuous and highly interesting performance, the outcome of which was proclaimed by the political artists who manipulated it to have bound the Republican party to the support of this measure now pending.

The unwritten and malodorous history of that so-called Republican conference will leave a dark brown taste in the mouths of those who participated in it that will require something stronger than No. 16 Dutch standard saccharine sweetness to remove! [Laughter and applause.]

It was not in any sense a conference. A conference is a meeting of individuals whose determinations and whose deliberations are controlled by the exercise of free will, guided by intelligence.

The methods that dominated that so-called conference possessed a greater similarity to the actions of a band of Ku Klux than to an orderly conference of the Republican party.

That conference was an unholy cabal, whose sessions were lengthened by false political pretenses in order to give time to a half dozen political pirates to knock down the weak and intimidate the faint-hearted!

Am I right? Who was it arose in that conference, when it was clearly seen that the opponents of this unwise and un-Republican measure were in a majority, and pleaded for more time for fair deliberation?

Who was it, I say, that arose, with his hoary hair streaming down his shoulders, and who put the tremolo stop on his voice at the proper psychological moment and urged more time for honest conference? Who was it urged that "we meet again and again and again, and yet again, for harmony's sake?"

Why, that was the same individual who, with his assistants, after gaining time enough to knock down and drag out a sufficient number of the weak but honest opponents of this measure, rushed into another caucus with a bare majority and immediately moved the previous question.

Is my memory pretty good on that subject? [Laughter.]

I recall that the gentleman from New York arose and agitated himself in the interest of harmony and pleaded for delay. He was in the minority on that celebrated occasion.

The change that overcame the spirit of the poet's dream was nothing to the change that overcame that gentleman when he succeeded in securing a so-called majority.

They made an onslaught on the herd. With the Administration lariat they dragged off the 2-year-olds. With a bucket of bran labeled "unanimous consent" they lured off the calves.

When that political round-up had continued for a sufficient length of time, it was decided that they had a majority—not a majority who were in favor of this measure, but a majority who had been convinced that it was best for them not to oppose it.

Then the gentleman from New York arose and looked lovingly down upon his assembled children and pronounced that beautiful political benediction. He said: "I am always willing to abide by the majority!" That was one of the most touching exhibitions of simple faith I ever witnessed. The gentleman's meaning would not have been any plainer, but he would have done greater credit to his candor if he had stated that he "was always willing to abide by the majority—when he had the majority."

I learned at least one valuable political lesson from the manipulations of that conference. The lesson I learned was this: Whenever you find yourself in a minority in a conference rush to the front and urge your conferees for more time to meet and consider; but the moment you find yourself in a small majority, then run the chariot ruthlessly over them. That is the science of statesmanship according to the most modern approved methods!

I make the statement here and now that there are not a majority of the members in this Chamber who are in favor of this bill, although it may be that a majority of them have been convinced that it is better for them that they should not be against it. [Laughter and applause.]

When we consider that this very bill and measure which we are now considering could never have been reported to this body in the shape in which we now find it had it not been for the immense power which the peculiar rules of this House vest in a few men, I say that this is a subject the consideration of which might well cause us to pause.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE.

We meet in this Chamber to-day a condition that challenges the consideration of every patriotic man, and that is, the set of rules under which this body operates, or perhaps it would be more nearly correct to say under which this body is operated. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I deem it my duty, knowing as I do that this measure could not have been brought here in the shape in which it now is, save and excepting for the remarkable conditions created in this House by these rules—I say, sir, I deem it to be my duty to pause for a moment or two on the threshold of this debate and place a few cold facts about these rules into this record and before the 70,000,000 people to whom we are responsible.

I approach this subject with a decided degree of deference. In the three years which I have been a member of this body I have endeavored to conduct myself with a modesty that I conceive to be becoming alike to the new member and to his constituency. I represent a Congressional district comprising the entire State of Washington, a Congressional district with half a million people in it and with vast and varied interests demanding legislation for their benefit and protection in many of the channels of trade and branches of industry.

It is with humiliation unspeakable that I rise in my place on this floor and admit to my constituents at home that in this House I am utterly powerless to bring any bill or measure, no matter how worthy or meritorious it may be, to a vote unless I can first make terms with the Speaker.

It may be a matter of news to some of the good people within the confines of the American Republic to know that there is no way of getting an ordinary unprivileged measure considered and voted upon in this House unless it suits the Speaker. I am aware that there are several theoretical ways of getting a measure up; but they have no actual reality—no fruitage in fact. I make the statement on this floor now, that no member of this body who introduces a bill—not a private bill, but a public bill—can get it considered or brought forward for final determination unless it suits the Speaker. And if anyone wants to deny that statement I am in a personal position and in a peculiarly happy frame of mind right now to give a little valuable testimony on that point! [Applause and laughter.]

Imagine, if you please, a measure—not a private measure, but a public measure—which has been considered at length by a great committee of this House and favorably reported with the recommendation that it do pass. That bill is then placed on the "Calendar." The Calendar! That is a misnomer. It ought to be called a cemetery [laughter], for therein lie the whitening bones of legislative hopes. [Laughter.] When the bill is reported and placed on the Calendar, what does the member who introduced it and who is charged by his constituency to secure its passage do? Does he consult himself about his desire to call it up? No. Does he consult the committee who considered the bill and recommended it for passage? No. Does he consult the will of the majority of this House? No. What does he do? I will tell you what he does. He either consents that that bill may die upon the Calendar or he puts his manhood and his individuality in his pocket and goes trotting down that little pathway of personal humiliation that leads to where? To the Speaker's room. Aye, the Speaker's room. All the glories that clustered around the holy of holies in King Solomon's temple looked like 30 cents [prolonged laughter and applause]; yes, looked like 29 cents compared with that jobbing department of this Government! [Applause and laughter.]

Then you are in the presence of real greatness. What then? Why, the Speaker looks over your bill and then he tells you whether he thinks it ought to come up or not!

There is a condition which I commend to the patriotic consideration of the American people. Contemplate that for a method of procedure in the legislative body of a great and free Republic.

WHO IS THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE?

Who is the Speaker of this House who sets up his immaculate and infallible judgment against the judgment of all comers? Is there anything different or superior in the credentials that he carries from the credentials that were issued to you and to me from 70,000,000 American people? When he entered this House at the beginning of the Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Congresses he was simply a Congressman-elect, bearing credentials like every other man on this floor. He has no greater power now than any other member, save the additional power we ourselves bestowed upon him by electing him Speaker and then adopting this set of rules. The question that now arises to confront us is, Have we put a club in the hands of some one else to beat us to death? Have we elevated one man on a pinnacle so high that he can not now see those who elevated him? Is the Speaker of this House a mere mortal man of common flesh and clay, or is he supernatural and immortal? What miracle was wrought at his birth? Did a star shoot from its orbit when he was born, or did he come into existence in the good old-fashioned way that ushered the rest of us into this vale of tears?

> Why, man, he doth bestride the narrow world
> Like a Colossus, and we petty men
> Walk under his huge legs and peep about
> To find ourselves dishonorable graves.
> Men at some time are masters of their fates:
> The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars,
> But in ourselves, that we are underlings.

I make no onslaught on the individual. I have a high regard for the Speaker of this House personally and for him politically; but we face the fact that we have adopted a set of rules in this body that are an absolute disgrace to the legislative body of any republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Ah, my Democratic friends may applaud, but remember while you are applauding that this is practically the same set of rules you yourselves adopted when you were in power. With me this is not a political question as much as it is a patriotic question. These rules are un-Republican, they are un-Democratic, they are un-American. [Applause.]

OUR DUTY TO CHANGE THE RULES.

The patriotic duty that to-day confronts every member of this House is the necessity of rising in our might and proclaiming a new Declaration of Independence. We need to restore this House to the great patriotic plane on which the founders of the Republic placed it, where every individual member on this floor stands upon an equal and exact plane with every other. [Applause.]

Under this set of rules the voice of the individual member of this body often is not heard in determining what shall be done; but at the same time he is always forced to share the responsibility of it after it is done. A system of that kind represents the superlative degree of everything that is unfair.

The way this House was intended to be run by the mighty men who conceived and fashioned our constitutional Government was that the members of the House were to inform the Speaker what legislation they intended to take up, not that the Speaker of the House would inform the members what legislation he would permit them to take up. [Applause.]

We operate here under a set of rules confessedly designed to belittle the hopes and dwarf the ambitions of the individual members of this body, while that same set of rules vests more power in the hands of two or three men than was ever enjoyed by an oriental despot or a ten-button mandarin! [Laughter.]

Here we sit like a lot of human midgets and legislative lilliputians trying to do business under a set of rules especially designed to dwarf the power and dim the hopes of the vast majority of the members of this body, while the same set of rules on the other hand is intended to swell the power and enlarge the influence of a few men beyond the point that it was ever intended that the influence of any one man should go in a free legislative body.

The system is rotten at both ends. It is rotten at one end because it robs the individual members in this House of the power that the Constitution of his country and the credentials of his people entitle him to: it is rotten at the other end because it vests power in other men that they have no right to, and ofttimes places on them duties they have no capacity to fulfill. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there are people in Washington City to-day who are going down to a theater and paying out 50 cents each of lawful money of the United States of America, of present standard weight and fineness, in order to see what? In order to see a performance of Lilliputians. Great God! what a sinful waste of money, when they can come up here and watch this House perform six days in the week for nothing! [Prolonged laughter and applause.]

I AM A REPUBLICAN.

Mr. Chairman, let no man charge me now with trying to tear the Republican party down. I am not trying to tear down the Republican party, but I confess that I sometimes feel that I would like to put my hand on the throat of one or two men who think that they are the Republican party. [Applause and laughter.] No, it is not because I want to tear down the Republican party, but because I want to build it up, that I call attention to these things. Centuries ago in Holy Writ it was said, "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth."

And in this modern day the true friend of his party is the man who does not sit idly by and watch his party drift into disrepute and toward destruction, but the man who rises up and calls attention to the evils that exist.

Nero sat on the hilltops and fiddled while the Eternal City rose in smoke and sank in ashes; and we are sitting here to-day idle and unconcerned while the great power of this ancient House, and the power and equality of its members, is being invaded, belittled, debauched, and destroyed. [Applause.] I for one can not sit here and endure it in silence. I must lift my voice against it, so help me God, if I speak alone.

It does not lie in the mouth of any man, here or elsewhere, to say that I am not a supporter of the Republican party because I call attention to evils that exist. I am a believer in the Republican party. I always have been since the days of my infancy when I gathered inspiration as I played with a pair of tattered and faded epaulets that came home to me from the war. [Applause.]

I am not now making war on the Republican party, but I am making war on the methods and the men of that little clique who are laboring under the mistaken idea that they are the Republican party.

Who are they? You might think from the power they assume that each one had been born with a scepter in his hand and a halo 'round his head to distinguish him from the ordinary Congressional scrub. [Laughter.]

On the contrary, they feed on the same kind of meat, and are made of the same kind of clay as the rest of us—and a pretty common brand of mud it is, too.

THE HOUSE MACHINE.

Throughout the entire three years of my service in this body I have been up against the little machine that dominates the proceedings and the deliberations of this House. During the entire three years prior to this time I have always treated that machine with the deference due to its age and its reputation. I trust you will excuse my frankness when I tell you that from this time on I shall devote a little of my time and a tithe of my energy to putting a few spokes in the wheel of that machine that the designers of the vehicle never ordered. [Laughter.]

I for one expect to live to see the day in this House, not when the Speaker shall tell the individual members of this House what he is going to permit them to bring up, but when those individual members constituting a majority will inform the Speaker what they are going to bring up for themselves.

THE CALENDAR OF THE HOUSE.

I for one expect to live to see the day in this Hall, when this House has leisure in the interim between the passage of the great appropriation bills, that this House will go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar. I expect to live to see the day when the Union Calendar will be called oftener than once in a lifetime.

Does anybody say it is lack of time that prevents this? I have seen this body adjourn three and four days at a time when the Union Calendar was freighted with the hopes of voiceless millions! No, sir; it does not lie in the mouth of this body or any member of it to say that it is lack of time. It is lack of inclixation and not lack of time that ails this body—or at least those who dominate it.

It does not require any longer time to pass the same bill when we are in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union than it does to pass it under unanimous consent. The only difference is the first is entirely within the power of the members themselves, while the unanimous-consent route is entirely controlled by the Speaker. But, sir, I have seen the Speaker's room black with members, like flies around a honeycomb, each one wondering if he was going to be able to persuade the Speaker to recognize him. I will tell you, sir, all we have to do to regulate this matter is not to put in so much time trying to get the Speaker to recognize us, but to rise up in our dignity and our might and recognize ourselves. [Applause.]

When we go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar, every man with a bill on that Calendar has, or ought to have, an equal chance to get his bill considered.

But under the other system—the unanimous-consent route—unfair and inequitable, the Speaker of this House stands up and passes out recognitions for "unanimous consents" like so many sugar-coated doughnuts. He recognizes those he desires to recognize, and he does not recognize those whom he does not wish to recognize.

What is the Union Calendar of this House and what bills go upon that Calendar? Every bill containing an appropriation of money or creating an office goes upon that Calendar. It is difficult to conceive of any important bill which would not include in its provisions one or the other of those features.

That being true, the most important bills that are introduced in this House go upon the Union Calendar. I would like to stand up in one crowd the 70,000,000 people in this Republic and have each one make a guess as to how often there is a call of the Union Calendar in the House of Representatives. It is never called! Only once in the last seven years has this House gone into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar. Why do we have a Calendar in this House? Did any man ever hear in his lifetime before of a Calendar that is never called? Under the present system of running this House we have no more need of a Calendar than a man with both arms cut off above the elbows needs a pair of fur-trimmed mittens. [Laughter.]

WHAT MAKES ME THIN.

A friend of mine some time ago said to me, "CUSHMAN, what makes you so thin?" I will tell you what makes me so thin. I have behind me an honest but infuriated constituency. A half a million worthy, honest, patriotic people who are demanding, and rightfully demanding, that I secure certain needed legislation for them. That is the pressure on me from the rear. Then in this House whenever I try to secure the consideration of matters of legislation in which my people are interested I run up against the stone wall that surrounds the Speaker of this House and the Committee on Rules. That is what constitutes the pressure in front. And I tell you frankly that between the pressure that has been brought to bear on me from the rear and the pressure I have encountered in front that I have become thinner than a canceled postage stamp! That is what is the matter with me. [Laughter.]

THE RIGHTS OF A LEGISLATOR.

Under the rules of this House, as they are administered, the rights of the individual legislator in this body are simply limited to his right to vote "yes" and "no" on the various propositions that are brought before this House.

I say to you that one of the rights inherent in and appertaining to the individual membership of every deliberative legislative body is not only the right to vote on the questions that are brought up, but the broader and higher right to have his voice heard and his vote recorded in determining what questions shall be brought up for consideration. And any man who denies that denies the existence of every principle that lies at the base of a republican form of government.

What do we amount to as individual legislative units in this House—this House that was once the great House of Representatives, the popular forum of a patriotic people? What is it now? It is an annex to the committee room of the Committee on Rules. Here is where we meet and go through the stupid formality of ratifying the legislation that is determined upon by the Speaker and his Committee on Rules. When I contemplate the system now in vogue in this House, under and by virtue of which no man can do anything unless the Speaker of the House and the Committee on Rules are willing that he should—I say when I contemplate that system it gives me a pain in my patriotism! [Laughter.]

GOVERNMENT WITHOUT THE CONSENT OF THE GOVERNED.

To me one of the amazing things that occur in this House is to have some man arise and select for his subject "Government without the consent of the governed," for the speaker invariably strains his eyes and cracks his voice trying to discern and draw pictures of an alleged condition of that kind in a region 7,000 miles away. Talk about government without the consent of the governed! If my brief legislative experience counts for anything, that system has reached its greatest perfection and found its most perfect flower right here is this Hall! [Laughter.] And, speaking on the pleasant topic of revolution and rebellion reminds me that the Republican party has heretofore made somewhat of a record of its ability to put down rebellion on distant isles beyond the sea—but I say to you unless there is a change in the manner in which this body is run I will give you a life-sized imitation of an incipient revolution on American soil—not in distant lands, but on domestic soil; not 7,000 miles away, but under the Dome of your country's Capitol!

I recognize no duty and confess no obligation that binds me to follow the leadership of this House with the pitiable confidence of a blind beggar following his leader, with no knowledge of where he is going.

I also recognize no party duty or political tie that obliges me to vote time after time to help the leaders of my party when they are in distress, and who are always deaf, dumb, and blind when I raise the signal of distress. [Applause.]

Do I make myself perfectly plain on that point? There is one phase of the "reciprocity" proposition that I commend to the careful consideration of the distinguished leaders of this House. [Laughter and applause.]

Some day in this House there will be an explosion of the honest patriotism and indignation of the individual members of this House, and on that day, in the midst of the fire and smoke incident upon that occasion, I expect to see blown right out through the roof of this Hall one small red buttonhole bouquet, one set of venerable white whiskers, and one large but not over-luminous body!

ASBESTUS EDITION WILL BE OUT LATER.

Now, then, with these few calm, cool, dispassionate, patriotic observations on the rules that govern this body, I shall pass from that theme to the main subject under discussion, with this final observation:

Owing to the brief time at my command, I am keenly sensible that I have not been able to do justice to the injustice of these rules. In closing, I promise you, sir, that at some time in the near future, on a suitable occasion, I shall deliver in this House a speech on the subject "The rules of this body," and I promise you that that speech will be so warm that it will have to be printed on asbestus paper and each one tied to a hand grenade for safe distribution! [Prolonged laughter and applause.]

RECIPROCITY.

When those who bring forward this measure try to cover its faults and obscure its defects by proclaiming loudly in the forum that it is a "reciprocity" measure, we have a right to turn to the lexicon of our party and read therefrom the definition of reciprocity as laid down and expounded by the fathers of the faith.

And if the pending measure does not fall within the definition of reciprocity as therein laid down, we have a perfect right to proclaim the fact that it is not a reciprocity measure.

And I state that this measure now before us for consideration does not resemble the reciprocity of the Republican platform and the Republican leaders any more than greenbackism and free silver resemble the declarations of the Republican party for sound money and the gold standard.

Those who are in favor of this measure say that it is a reciprocity measure, and having conferred that title upon it they attempt to crowd it through under that name.

In determining whether or not this is a reciprocity measure it is necessary, in the first place, to determine what constitutes reciprocity and how it is defined.

The reciprocity that I believe in is an aid and an adjunct to protection. The kind of reciprocity contained in this bill is absolutely destructive of the protection from which it sprung and the policy that it is supposed to aid.

I am in favor of a reciprocity that is in harmony with protection, and not that is destructive of it.

Protection and reciprocity are like the right and the left hands of man. The two hands work in unison. You might as well set a laborer to work in the morning under orders to work until noon with his right hand, and in the afternoon to destroy with his left hand what in the morning he had wrought with his right.

I say you might as well do that, by way of comparison, for, in my judgment, such a policy as that would not be any more imbecile or assinine than to make a reciprocity treaty to tear down what a protection law has already created.

The two great economic policies brought forth by the Republican party have been the policies of protection and reciprocity. These are the two children born to this nation since the destinies of the Republic became wedded to the Republican party. [Applause.]

Has the first child been reared to be assassinated by the second infant; or are they to live together in harmony for the further development and the greater glory of our beloved common country?

WHAT WILLIAM M'KINLEY SAID.

We hear a great deal these days about what William McKinley said about reciprocity. I challenge the pages of my country's history when I say the whole life work of William McKinley furnishes a complete vindication for those of us who oppose this bill. Every speech he ever made, every platform on which he ever stood, were opposed to the policy embodied in this bill.

William McKinley in his lifetime never advocated a brand of reciprocity that raised its banner above the coffin of an American industry. [Applause.]

There is a certain class of individuals, numerically small but wonderfully industrious, who make it their business to try and overthrow the work of a man's entire lifetime by digging out one short sentence from a speech made late in life and by divorcing that sentence from its surroundings, its limitations, and its qualifications. In this manner they are able to prove almost anything. This same class has been busy on the record of William McKinley.

If one were to listen to the pratings of some of the advocates of this bill about McKinley reciprocity, he might be inclined to the belief that in the last hour of his life—a life devoted to the upbuilding of a protective wall to shelter the domestic industries of his nation—that in the last hour of his life he became recreant to the principles and the policies of protection which had made him the great champion of the Republican party.

The people who make those remarks never read the complete and unabridged edition of the President's Buffalo speech—that gem of English undefiled that fell from his patriotic lips a few short days before his immortal spirit took its flight.

On the proposition of reciprocity and extending our markets he said:

> By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus.

That was the central sentence of his entire sentiment expressed on that occasion regarding reciprocity. That was the keystone of the arch as far as that paragraph of his speech was concerned. All else rest upon and cluster around that.

Whoever attempts to mutilate that speech by omitting that sentence or belittling its importance is a political vandal who would mutilate and deface one of the grandest monuments of our heroic dead. [Loud applause.]

DECLARATIONS OF REPUBLICAN NATIONAL PLATFORMS.

In the course of this debate it has been urged by those supporting this bill that there was nothing in the platform declarations of the Republican party inconsistent with this proposed measure. I deny it. I will read you what the Republican party said on this subject in its two last national platforms:

Platform of 1896:

RECIPROCITY.

> Protection and reciprocity are twin measures of Republican policy, and go hand in hand.
> * * * * * * *
> Protection for what we produce; free admission for the necessities of life which we do not produce.

Then for fear that plain declaration in favor of "protection for what we produce" might not be specific enough, follows this specific declaration in favor of protection to the beet and cane sugar producers of America:

> We condemn the present Administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country. The Republican party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use. * * *

Platform of 1900:

> We favor the associated policy of reciprocity, so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce. * * *

There is what the platforms of the Republican party have announced on the issues of reciprocity and the especial protection due the American sugar producer.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] says the declarations of the Republican platform do not mean anything. Great God! what a statement, and from what a source. The great steps and strides of onward progress that this nation has made in the last thirty years can be traced step by step by reading the platforms of the Republican party. And it is the men in the ranks of our party that have made the pledges of those platforms good who will live in the history of their country, and not the men who tried to tear the platform down.

The gentleman states that the hasty and ill-considered manner in which a party platform is constructed is not to be compared to the calm, careful, deliberative, legislative method in which this thing was born! [Laughter.]

I submit to you, my friends, who know the inside history of the manner in which this measure was conceived and the wire-pulling methods that stood, sponsor-like, round its cradle in the hour of its birth, I submit to you that it is not now to be elevated on any immaculate pedestal.

As between the Republican party platform, the enunciation of the millions of Republicans of this country, and the peculiar methods that have been used in connection with this bill, the presumptions of purity and reliability are vastly in favor of the platform declaration.

WHAT BLAINE SAID.

Now, then, we have had other declarations upon this subject of reciprocity. One of the great names that shine forth from the luminous annals of the Republican party is the great name of James G. Blaine. [Applause.] He was the leader of our party on the protection issue, and he was the pioneer in the pathway of reciprocity. It is indeed fortunate for those of us who oppose this measure on this floor that that splendid champion of protection, that able defender of the industries of his nation, left emblazoned on the walls of the Republic, high above the mutilating hand of the partisan, a few enduring sentiments on this subject.

Before the white plume of that knightly Navarre sank in death, before he lowered his shining lance before the grim destroyer, he left recorded in the annals of the nation a confession of his faith. [Applause.]

On September 15, 1890, James G. Blaine wrote a letter from Bar Harbor, Me., addressed to Col. W. W. Clapp, editor of the Boston Journal, which letter was published in the New York Daily Tribune September 17, 1890.

In this letter he speaks of a proposed reciprocity treaty the terms of which some of the people in New England had criticised. In the letter he says:

> They can do great good by counteracting a certain phase of New England opinion, entertained at home as well as in Washington—an opinion which I must regard as in the highest degree unwise and hurtful to New England interests. New England is to receive in the new tariff the amplest protection for every manufacturing industry within her borders, both great and small, and it will, in my judgment, be both inexpedient and injurious for her representatives to disregard a measure which will promote Western interests.
> Giving the fullest protection to all Eastern interests, as the proposed tariff bill does, surely no man of good judgment, certainly no protectionist of wise forecast, wishes to expose a Western interest to serious injury, especially when it is easy to protect and promote it.

That is what James G. Blaine said about the reciprocity end of a tariff measure in its practical relation to the agricultural industries of the great West.

Does any man who knows the history of his country, or has read the history of our party, doubt for a moment where James G. Blaine would stand on this subject if he were alive to-day?

If I could by any subtle alchemy, by marvel or by miracle, conjure into this presence for one brief hour the mystic shade of the Plumed Knight who first led the hosts of protection—does any man doubt where he would stand on this proposition?

If he could have heard some of the speeches that have been made from the Republican side of this House on this proposition he might think he had been resurrected into the midst of a free-trade ratification meeting. [Applause.]

On August 30, 1890, in a public speech at Waterville, Me., discussing the policy of reciprocity and reciprocal trade, James G. Blaine said:

> I do not mention protection because I do not intend to speak in reference thereto before this audience. That would be a needless, if not an impertinent, effort. I merely wish to proclaim its victories.

Then he passes on to the real question of reciprocity, which he intends to discuss. Here is the statement of the greatest tariff champion the world ever saw. Here is the statement of the man in whose mighty and matchless brain was conceived the original idea of reciprocity. And I read his words as my justification to 70,000,000 of my countrymen for my vote on this bill—and while I read them I call man and God to witness how wide is the chasm that separates the reciprocity of SERENO E. PAYNE from the reciprocity of James G. Blaine! [Applause.]

Blaine said:

> As I have already intimated, I am here to speak of the expansion of our foreign trade, not by any novel process, not by any mode that will shock or disturb home industries, not by any mode that will invite our people to rash experiments, or that will launch us in doubtful or dangerous investments.
> What I mean to speak of briefly is a system of reciprocity not in conflict with a protective tariff, but supplemental thereto.

How different that sounds from the thing proposed here! Remember that Blaine was Secretary of State and Harrison was President of the United States, and Harrison was in full accord with Blaine on this subject of protection and reciprocity. Sir, we on this side, this little band of ours gathered together, are not insurgents; we are the keepers of the faith, the faith that has been the faith of the Republican party from the hour of its birth down to the last tick of the clock. This has been the faith of the Republican party, and these are the statements of the great leaders of our party—the treasured names and idolized faces that have made the history of our nation both memorable and glorious. [Applause.]

I appeal from the reciprocity of JOHN DALZELL to the reciprocity of Benjamin Harrison. I appeal from the reciprocity of Congressman GROSVENOR to the reciprocity of William McKinley. I appeal from the reciprocity of SERENO E. PAYNE to the reciprocity of James G. Blaine! [Great applause.]

A YOUNG PATRIOT FROM OHIO.

After this measure has been debated for so long on this floor, I can not hope, in the closing days of this debate, to add much light to the subject. There are many of us who are opposing this measure who are willing to aid and assist Cuba. We think that Cuba can be aided in a way that will not destroy or menace the American sugar industry. The plan we had outlined was that the Cuban government, instead of receiving a 20 per cent reduction on the tariff rates on what they import into this country (which reduction would add to the profits of the American Sugar Refining Company rather than find its way to the Cuban), that they should pay the full import duty on what they imported into the United States, and then there should be turned back direct to the Cuban government from the United States Treasury, for distribution among the Cuban cane producers according to the amount of cane produced, an amount equal to 20 per cent of the duties paid on goods imported from Cuba. My views on that subject were very concisely stated by a young Congressman from Ohio.

There is a young Republican on this floor who lives in and now represents the Eighteenth Ohio Congressional district—the same district represented so long and ably by the lamented McKinley. A most loyal and lovable man is he upon whose young shoulders has fallen the mantle of our once great leader. Congressman ROBERT W. TAYLER is a man who received his ideas on protection and reciprocity directly from the throne of Republican grace—right under the drippings of the sanctuary. [Applause.] The most clear and concise statement of the views of those of us who oppose this bill was enunciated by that young champion from Ohio, and I am proud, indeed, to have the privilege of incorporating these views in my speech. In voicing the views of those of us opposed to this pending measure and favoring the plan of turning back to the Cuban an amount equal to the 20 per cent, he used the following language:

We oppose the proposition to reduce the tariff on Cuban products coming into this country because it involves a relaxation of the protective principle.

The Republican platform of 1896 condemned the Democratic party for not keeping faith with the American sugar growers; we seek not to merit for ourselves the same condemnation.

The proposition to reduce the sugar tariff is unwise and unjust, because—

1. It constitutes, in essence, an abandonment of the protective principle, even though it removes only one-fifth of the duty imposed by the Dingley law. And this abandonment is most unhappy because applied to the pursuit of agriculture in the most conspicuous instance in which specific and manifest protection is given to the farmer, and at the moment when the beet industry is not only in its infancy, but in an infancy so lusty and promising as to demonstrate the certainty of a rapid and prodigious growth. The beet-sugar industry exhibits in the most perfect form we have yet known the most approved principles of protection.

Heretofore the farmer has been compelled to find his justification of protection, from the standpoint of personal interest, in the prosperity reflected from the industrial artisan, and in the main he has, through good report and evil, been bravely loyal.

Since our platform of 1896 gave a party's guaranty of performance the people took us at our word, and we have demonstrated that in the beet-sugar industry we could more vividly than in any other enterprise illustrate to the American farmer on his own broad acres the beneficence of the American system of protection.

The American market for over $100,000,000 worth of sugar annually is rightfully his. We shall encourage no policy which delays the time when he shall come into his own.

2. As to the fancied duty to Cuba because of a distress which is only apparent in the admitted fact that every man on the island has all the work he can do at higher wages than he ever before received, we have only to say that the low price of sugar is a mere business condition of temporary character, and that to compromise with it on the terms proposed is, in its interference with the policy of protection, to pay too high a price for all the good that can possibly come to those whom it is intended to benefit.

The proposition is to undertake to insure commercial and industrial prosperity in Cuba, a foreign country and a foreign government. If we undertake it, when and where are we to stop?

It is a startling proposition entirely outside of our governmental functions and our constitutional power.

Whenever we have undertaken to insure commercial and industrial prosperity in the United States, our own country, by means of a protective tariff, we have been bitterly assailed on the ground of paternalism.

Now, at the expense of our own labor, our own capital, and our own industry, and largely at the expense of a single industry, without reducing the cost of sugar to the American consumer, we are asked to extend the paternal hand to a foreign people on the ground that, having given them liberty, we are morally obligated to secure them commercial and industrial prosperity, even at the sacrifice of our own interests.

We emphatically deny that we are under any such obligation, morally or otherwise.

We insist that such an undertaking subjects the Congress of the United States to the charge of being false to its constitutional obligations, untrue to the people it represents, and, from a political standpoint, false to the pledges made by the party to the people when it asked and received their support.

3. Entirely independent of its effect on the beet-sugar industry as a present fact in established concerns, it would smother the further development of the industry through the scores of plants now in various stages of active advancement.

An industry which has grown fivefold in the last four years and doubled since 1900 has in it the certainty of a future development so stupendous as to beggar prophecy and appeal with cogent force to our national pride.

4. In so far as the proposition professes to be in the line of Republican reciprocity, we assert that it is essentially a denial of that great policy. We deny that reciprocity is desirable except as a corollary to the greater policy of protection. Republican reciprocity, wise reciprocity, does not seek an exchange of products at the expense of any American industry; it does not seek to give—it does not give—commercial advantage to any foreign product which comes into competition with our own products; it does not seek an exchange of products which deprives any American artisan of his work or any American farmer of an opportunity to profitably till the soil.

This was explicitly declared by McKinley in his Buffalo speech in the following words:

"By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus."

And by President Roosevelt in his annual message in these words:

"And that reciprocity be sought for so far as it can safely be done without injury to our home industries."

5. To say that the duty on sugar is to be lowered on the plea that it helps Cuba is to say that it must always be lowered when Cuba needs help; and a reduction of one-fifth by the House of Representatives means that elsewhere, both in and out of Congress, the extent of that reduction shall be measured by the varying views of those who consider it.

It must therefore follow that the protective principle is to be subordinated to the question as to what amount of help Cuba may need.

With such a policy declared by a Republican majority, what wise business man can be induced to invest his money in the beet-sugar industry? What promise will there be of its future development?

And if that Republican majority is once constrained to such a policy, what license have we to believe that the citadel of protection will not be further assaulted in the house of its friends? When that time comes the days of Republican supremacy will be numbered.

Never more earnestly than at this hour have we been summoned to our duty; never has the cause of protection—to which we owe our party success and our national prosperity—more needed our undivided and unflinching support.

We pledged our faith in 1896 to the sugar growers of the country, and they took us at our word; in 1897 we kept the faith and passed the Dingley law, and the people, relying on that law and our party pride and tradition, proceeded to develop in amazing proportions the industry which we specifically encouraged them to enter.

We are told that the pending proposition will not hurt the beet-sugar producers; but surely no one anywhere has asserted that it would help them.

A tariff measure which has the unanimous indorsement of free traders is not above suspicion, and a search warrant will not be needed to find all the protection that is hidden away in it.

[Applause.]

The following terse declaration of principles was adopted by those of us who oppose this bill. I indorse the language, I approve the sentiment, and I ask for it the candid consideration of my countrymen:

1. It will afford relief both to the government and to the people of Cuba.
2. It makes certain that Cuba and her people, and no one else, will be the beneficiaries of our action.
3. By its adoption we keep faith with the people of this country and with the people of Cuba.
4. It does not violate our national party platforms of 1896 and 1900.
5. It does not disturb existing conditions in this country.
6. It does not alter or modify any schedule of the present tariff law.
7. It does not injure or discourage any domestic industry or prevent its further development.
8. It avoids an inopportune agitation of questions affecting industrial conditions of unparalleled prosperity.
9. It would secure reciprocal trade concessions from Cuba and give time to ascertain the value of such trade relations between the two Republics under existing conditions.
10. Its reciprocal feature furnishes a consideration which makes the proposed measure of undoubted constitutionality. It is as competent for Congress to purchase trade concessions from foreign countries as to purchase naval or coaling stations.
11. It is sustained by precedent since the establishment of our Government, and particularly by the legislation refunding duties collected on the products of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands.
12. It affords the means and opportunity for successfully inaugurating and permanently establishing the new government of Cuba during a time which the experience of all nations has shown will be its most critical period.
13. It affords relief until the present adverse trade conditions affecting the price of sugar shall have been improved by the abolishment of European sugar bounties.
14. It discharges every obligation assumed by us under the provisions of the treaty of Paris, the Platt amendment, and by our intervention to secure the independence of Cuba.

TWO IMPORTANT REASONS.

In the early days of this debate the statement was continually made that there was want and distress in Cuba which must be relieved. But that statement has been so completely disproved that nobody makes it now.

The statement now made is that there is likely to be distress in Cuba unless we do something for them. Well, I am a charitable individual and I belong to a charitable party—the Republican party—but before I make a contribution of the money of the people of the United States for some alleged charitable purpose there are a few things I want clearly explained in advance.

In the first place, I want to know the exact condition that makes the charity necessary and the contribution desirable.

Second, I want to be morally certain that the contribution made will in the end reach the party for whom it was intended.

Unfortunately, in the case which we are now discussing, an examination into those two features of this case show that in the first place the condition of the Cuban does not justify our action, and in the second place if we took the action contemplated by this bill the results of it would never reach the Cuban—two most excellent and convincing reasons for any man being against this bill.

It is said that the Cuban is sure to be in distress within a short time unless we do something for him at once. That same statement was made last December in this Hall. Here it is the 17th of April and distress has not reached the Cuban yet. If he lived through the first half of the year without the predictions of distress coming true, who knows but he may now exist through the last half of the year under the same fortunate circumstances?

AN OVERPRODUCTION OF SUGAR.

The principal reason advanced by the proponents of this bill, which they claim will relieve Cuba—which statement I emphatically deny—is that there has been this year a great overproduction of sugar throughout the world, and as a result of that vast overproduction the price of sugar is bound to go down, and if the price of sugar (the chief product of the Cuban) does go down the Cuban is sure to be in distress.

Now, I hope that I am as willing to extend a helping hand toward Cuba as anyone. But I submit to you, sir, that when we guaranteed to Cuba liberty and a stable government we did not guarantee to her continuous agricultural prosperty and a never-ending era of high prices for her products. It seems to me the most startling proposition I ever heard of that because there has been an overproduction in Cuba that we are expected to boost the price of her commodity by a contribution from the United States Treasury.

Before embarking on that mad career of miscellaneous governmental donation I want to know if any man in this Hall ever heard of low prices of American agricultural productions brought about by overproduction?

AN OVERPRODUCTION OF WHEAT.

I have lived all my life in the great farming sections of the West. I think I know something about the proposition of overproduction and reduced prices.

I have stood in the midst of the great grain belts of the West when the sunshine, like the magic touch of Midas, had turned the earth to gold as far as the eye could reach.

During several of these years it became plainly apparent that the supply was going to far outstrip the market, that the production was far in excess of the demand.

It was also apparent that the price of grain would thereby depreciate, and ofttimes that the American farmer was left in financial distress as the only heritage of his industry.

I say I remember all this, and I wish to emphasize that fact, because no statesman then rose in this Hall and proposed legislation that should relieve the American farmer from distress as the result of overproduction.

Now, then, if we have no duty to aid the American farmer from overproduction when his distress is actual and apparent, who is going to say that we are in duty bound to relieve a foreign people from overproduction, especially when their distress is not actual or apparent, but merely a possibility of the future? [Applause.]

OUR DUTY TO CUBA.

One of the phases of this question that are continually pressed into the foreground by the advocates of this measure is that there has this year been an excess in the production of sugar over the demand for the same.

That that has resulted in lowering the price of sugar.

And the people of Cuba are therefore likely to be in distress unless we give a 20 per cent reduction of the tariff on their sugar imported into this country.

That proposition carried to its legitimate conclusion forms a sort of sliding scale by which our benevolence is to be regulated. That is, the degree of their distress (real or apparent) is to be made the basis and the measure of our relief by legal enactment.

If their condition to-day demands a 20 per cent reduction, and we give it to them, then, by the application of the same rule, if their necessities to-morrow demand a reduction of 100 per cent, we will be bound to grant that.

If we follow that legislative pathway to its logical end, we will soon be paying the Cuban a bounty on his sugar production to keep him from the doorway of distress; but by the same law we will have at the same time legislated a similar American industry into the ditch, and sent the American sugar producer, a commercial and industrial bankrupt, staggering to his financial grave. [Applause.]

DUTY TO THE CHILD.

In all the florid rhetoric with which the proponents of this measure have pressed it to the front the favorite figure of speech with them all—which has now become time-honored and shopworn—is "duty to the child," and by that symbolism of speech our duty to Cuba is compared to the duty due from guardian toward his ward or a parent toward his child.

I am willing to accept the comparison and argue the case from that standpoint.

Duty in the family of nations, like charity in the individual family, begins at home.

Our first duty as American citizens and American legislators is due not to the alien infant, but to the domestic offspring.

What a peculiar conception of duty it must be that prompts a man to do more for his neighbor's child than his own. What a peculiar idea that in order to discharge your duty toward the human race you must feed and clothe the infants of all humanity, though the child of your own hearth be left both hungry and naked.

WHAT WE ARE WILLING TO DO FOR CUBA.

Let me inform you that those who are the proponents of this proposition are not the only people who are willing to do something for Cuba.

Those who oppose this proposition are the real friends of the Cubans.

In my humble judgment, if this measure passes and becomes a law not one out of every hundred Cuban cane growers will ever learn that such a law passed. If the benefits which this law is supposed to extend to the Cuban fail to reach him, then it will be a matter of little or no interest to him whether a law passed that it was supposed was going to benefit him.

On the point of our willingness to extend aid to Cuba there is practically no one on this floor who will declare against that proposition.

The difference arises when we try to reach an agreement as to how that aid shall be extended.

There are some of us on this floor who believe that the ingenuity of the American Congress ought to be able to devise some way of extending the help of this Government to that island without at the same time destroying an American industry.

We likewise believe that there ought to be some way devised by the ingenuity of man whereby aid might be sent from the Federal Treasury of the United States to the island of Cuba without filtering the funds through the sugar trust.

The Cuban does not produce or handle any REFINED sugar. His only produce and his sole commodity is RAW sugar.

To my mind it is perfectly clear that the American Sugar Refining Company is the only purchaser of raw sugar in this country; that they can and will fix the price of the raw sugar which they buy. To deny that is to deny everything elemental and axiomatic in trade relations.

Then a 20 per cent reduction to the Cuban in bringing his raw sugar into this country does not change his trade relation with the monopoly that fixes the price of the only product he has for sale. As they still control the price, you may be sure that the straight reduction of the duty will ultimately result in the profit of the transaction finding its way into the coffers of the commercial concern that control the situation. Men have tried to becloud that feature of this case, but it stands forth in all its indefensible clearness.

There was a proposition submitted by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] to let the Cuban pay the full duty, and then pay back from the United States Treasury a sum equal to 20 per cent of the duties so paid for distribution among the Cuban cane growers.

It would seem to any man who wanted to be fair, and especially to those who were anxious to help the poor Cuban, that there was a proposition the direct benefits of which no man could doubt would go direct to the Cuban.

Yet gentlemen arose and said that it was not only unconstitutional, but it was impractical; that it could not be accomplished; that money could not be successfully distributed in that way.

One of the earliest mathematical lessons I learned was that "A straight line is the shortest distance between two points." Now, then, if the Cuban is to be helped from the United States Treasury the straighter the line from the Treasury to the Cuban the more sure he is to get the benefit of the funds destined for his benefit. [Applause.]

It is one of the peculiarities of this remarkable debate that the same men who think that it would be impossible for the Cuban to secure the benefit of funds sent direct to him from the United States Treasury are the same gentlemen who feel morally sure that he would get the entire benefit of the same funds if they are filtered to him through the medium of the American sugar trust!

A "PAYNE" IN OUR INDUSTRY.

Mr. Chairman, I have been highly interested as well as entertained by some of the peculiar statements that have been made on this floor in support of this measure. In passing a few criticisms on the remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], let it be understood that I do not mean to make any personal onslaught on him as an individual, nor do I wish to be understood as stating or intimating that he is unfair or actuated by improper motives. I think he is a very able man, and I have a high regard and admiration for him, but some of the remarkable statements he made in this debate failed to appeal to my poor faculties. Their force was lost to me. Among other things, when speaking of Cuba's need for this legislation he dramatically exclaimed: "The weeds grow up in Cuba, and then the weeds have to be cut down, and then they grow up again." The weeds grow up. Remarkable fact! And then the weeds have to be cut down. Peculiar situation! [Laughter.] And then the weeds grow up again. Unprecedented agricultural phenomena! [Laughter.] As far as I know, that is the only spot in the universe where this peculiar and remarkable condition exists!

The gentleman from New York insisted with great energy that the sugar trust could not possibly receive any of the benefits of this reduction. He made sport of the statements of those who differed with him. He said he preferred to take his facts from the page of history rather than from the realm of prophecy.

Well, I picked up a newspaper a short time ago, just after this agitation began, and read in one column the statement of the stock market showing the remarkable rise of the stock of the American Sugar Refining Company, and in the next column I read the commercial obituary of an American beet-sugar factory. These were in parallel columns of the same sheet. There is some unvarnished history—some mighty recent history—which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] can avail himself of if he desires.

PAYNE'S RECIPROCITY—DEMOCRATIC FREE TRADE.

One of the most startling and suggestive incidents of this debate was in evidence on the opening day of the discussion on this subject.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], Republican chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, arose and gave this measure his unqualified support because it was a high protective tariff measure.

Within the hour—before the sands in the glass had run once—Mr. MCCLELLAN, Democratic member of the Ways and Means Committee, arose and gave this same measure his unqualified approval because it was a breach in the wall of protection and the beginning of free trade!

PAYNE vouched for it as being McKinley reciprocity.

And MCCLELLAN read into the RECORD the unqualified indorsement of William Jennings Bryan, the uncompromising free trader, and those two statements are now in print in the parallel columns of the same issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD! [Applause.]

Surely we have reached, in your day and mine, the full realization of that wonderful prophecy, that—

The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid.

I trust you will pardon me if I am a little skeptical as to the immaculate conception or the spiritual authenticity of an alleged high protective tariff measure that has the unanimous indorsement of pronounced free traders.

There is a beautiful picture to contemplate: PAYNE with one foot on the solid wall of protection and the other planted on the ramparts of free trade, with the sugar trust in his arms and the Republican platform in his hip pocket—there is a tableau that, with the aid of a little red fire and a slow curtain, would bring tears to the eyes of an Egyptian mummy. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from New York assured us all that he was fighting the sugar trust.

Ah, sir, I tremble for that weak and unprotected fledgling as I see the gentleman from New York, arrayed in all the shining panoply of war, with his mailed hand raised aloft to smite the monster, as he bears down on the American sugar trust!

The destruction that overtook the heathen at Sennacherib will not be a circumstance to the slaughter that will occur when PAYNE reaches the sugar trust!

GROSVENOR.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in his opening remarks stated that his speech would not be published as a campaign document by the Democratic party.

These few remarks of mine may never be published as a campaign document by any political party. I shall be satisfied if they pass down to posterity in the form of a Sunday-school tract, being a bright and shining example of the fearless recital of a few wholesome truths and unvarnished facts.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] also stated in his remarks that the men of this House who are trying to protect the American sugar producer will find themselves in the minority before the people, because he said that there are only half a million people in the United States who are producers of sugar while the other sixty-nine and a half million people are consumers of sugar.

In the next sentence he asserted that this legislation here proposed would not reduce the price of sugar any. Now, then, if the price is not to be reduced any to the sixty-nine and a half million consumers, where did the gentleman from Ohio get the warrant for assuming that they would all be on one side of this question?

The doctrine of protection to American industries is founded on the system of protecting each and every one that needs protection. When the gentleman from Ohio tried to justify his course in this matter by contrasting the number of sugar producers with the number of sugar consumers, he got his feet entirely off the Republican platform. There are more people in this country who buy wool than those who raise it. Does he want to advocate a reduction in the tariff on wool for that reason?

Why, not only is the measure now pending before this House a step toward free trade, but a lot of shopworn and threadbare free-trade arguments that were used by the Democratic party twenty years ago are now being resurrected and galvanized into life and added to the ammunition in the arsenal of those who are firing away in support of this bill.

CONGRESSMAN GROSVENOR MY FRIEND AND BENEFACTOR.

There have been some things said by my own friends in this controversy that I can not indorse.

I was pained by the attack of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HENRY C. SMITH] upon the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. Sir, I can not permit that incident to pass unheeded, but must pause to place the stamp of my disapproval upon it.

There are many gentlemen in this House whom I look upon as friends, but the place the gentleman from Ohio occupies in my affections is not only that of a friend, but my personal and political benefactor. It was largely through his instrumentality that I have been elected to Congress in two bitterly fought campaigns.

It occurrred in this way:

In the State in which I reside we can not make a campaign in a Pullman car, as some gentlemen on this floor travel over their districts. I go over my State on the train, by wagon, on a bicycle, in a rowboat, or on a mule—any way to get there, in fact.

Now, when a man gets ready to campaign in my State he simply puts on a clean pair of socks, puts a toothbrush in his pocket, and starts. No baggage-train equipment. [Laughter.]

On getting ready to begin my first campaign I wanted to take along a lot of documents covering different points, because the people in my State are thoroughbreds. They do their own thinking; and sometimes they ask some very awkward questions, and a man must travel constantly loaded.

Well, I could not possibly carry a lot of books; it was simply out of the question.

What did I do? I will tell you. I got a complete set of GROSVENOR'S speeches and carried them with me. And I went through that campaign triumphantly and without a scratch! Nobody could embarrass me at any time or on any subject, because I could always, in an instant, prove or disprove anything that the necessities of my case required by referring to that volume! [Prolonged laughter and applause on the floor.]

When I was in the manufacturing districts and near the railway centers, where the great corporations had a big pay roll and the people had a friendly feeling toward the company, I could prove instantly by that volume that our party had a warm side toward capital. When I got into the "rooral deestricks," if the feeling was against capital I could instantly prove by that same volume that we were chasing the hydra-headed financial monster into his lair.

There can not anybody stand up on this floor in my presence and abuse the man who occupies such a prominent and necessary place in the economy of our party as does my friend from Ohio. I simply will not stand it! [Laughter.]

CHASING GROSVENOR AROUND THE CIRCLE.

Now, then, in the coming campaign some of my friends have felt that we may be embarrassed in meeting this issue when presented to us. Why, nobody on the Republican side of this Chamber need be agitated at all on that subject, no matter how he voted. As long as you stick to GROSVENOR you have got a dead, immortal cinch! I will prove it to you. If any unbeliever tries to embarrass me in my next campaign, I promise you I will make it warm for him. Now, then:

First. If some fellow rises up and charges me with not being willing to do something for Cuba by decreasing the duty on her sugar, I will simply hand him a copy of the report on that subject filed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], wherein it is conclusively proved that if we put Cuban sugar on the free list it would not only destroy the American sugar producer, but enormously enrich the sugar trust at the same time. That answer will annihilate that fellow.

Second. Then, if some other political infidel arises and tries to criticise me, saying I ought to have voted for this bill and that this proposed reduction on Cuban sugar would not injure the American sugar producer, why I will read that fellow the testimony of the Congressman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], on page 430 of the committee hearings, and prove conclusively to him that such a course was bound to hurt the American sugar producer: "Nobody could help knowing that who knew enough to put two and two together." That will be the end of the second man who tackles me! [Laughter.]

Third. Then, if my political enemies rally for the final charge on me and assert that I ought not to have voted for this bill, I will take a copy of GROSVENOR'S speech made here in the House and throw that at their heads, and that will spike their last cannon! [Laughter.]

I tell you there can not anybody frighten me in the next campaign by any charges as to what attitude my party took or the attitude that anybody took on this measure.

With those three documents, sir, we are armed at every point. A man may be able to chase me clear around the circle on that subject, but I promise you he will never catch up. [Laughter.]

I will take those three documents of General GROSVENOR'S and have them bound together into one small, compact volume, and then I will be invulnerable and invincible. I will guarantee to go through the hottest campaign the Democratic party ever organized for destructive purposes, and come out without the smell of smoke or sugar on my garments! [Prolonged laughter and applause.]

THE BEATERS OF TOM-TOMS.

The history of the American aborigine tells us that when the North American red men prepared to make an onslaught on the citadels of civilization their universal tactics were to send a detachment of savages into the brush on the opposite side of the village from which the attack was intended to be made; their business was to beat tom-toms on the other side of the village in order to attract attention to that point, while the painted horde of savages swarmed over the unprotected palisade on the other.

Since those days the human race has changed somewhat in outer garb and visible ornaments, but the same characteristics in the race are still visible to the naked eye of the close observer.

In these modern days when some political half-breed comes forth from his Medicine Lodge [laughter] intent on violating the traditions of his tribe, getting ready to repudiate the political platform of his party, determined to assassinate an infant industry in order to subsidize a trust—why, under those circumstances it becomes necessary to do a little artistic tom-tom work in order to throw dust in the eyes of the honest but unsuspecting to conceal the point of attack and likewise cover the retreat.

The tom-tom that has been assiduously hammered to make the necessary noise in this particular case is: "We must do something for Cuba." And how industriously they have hammered on that I call all my countrymen to witness. They have taken that one phrase, "We must do something for Cuba," and have set it up in block type, had it stereotyped, and then taken out a copyright on the plate. They have paraded it in the market place and reiterated it in the forum.

A part of the established programme in this case seems to have been to silence all criticism and drown all just objection to this measure in that continuous chorus "We must do something for Cuba."

WHEN THE CUBAN SAW THE RED, WHITE, AND BLUE.

Sir, it may be that the Cuban, as he stands to-day in the center of his infant island republic, in the dawn of his nationality, in the beginning of his liberty, as he looks abroad upon the nations of the earth, he may discern here or there a nation that owes a duty to him and to his countrymen. But, sir, if there is any nation on the footstool and under the canopy that has more than discharged her obligations to Cuba that nation is the United States. In the annals of the ages that fact will be recorded in letters of living light.

The United States has done more for Cuba in four short and glorious years than all the remaining powers, kingdoms, and monarchies of the earth have accomplished in four hundred long and bloody years.

We have given them the gold of our Treasury, the priceless blood of young American manhood, and protection and asylum underneath the folds of our flag.

As the pitiful reconcentrado stood alone in the midst of that little island, desolated by war and swept by famine, as he lifted his wan face and his withered arms in the midst of his agony and distress he swept the horizon of the universe for aid; his listening ear caught no sound and his anxious eye beheld no signal of succor till far toward the westward, mingled with the hues of the sunset, he beheld the heroic colors of the red, white, and blue. [Great applause.]

From that hour his freedom was certain and his salvation was assured. The American nation for his salvation and his preservation left the hills and valleys of his little island slippery with the best blood that eighteen centuries of civilization have produced. As an earnest of our faith and an evidence of our sacrifice, there lie to-day in the murky waters of his harbor the bones of our heroic seamen, and the waves of the ocean sing their only requiem.

There are some things in this world about which there can be no doubt. If the end of the universe were at hand to-day, and a balance was to be struck in the clearing house of all Christendom between all nations, it is almighty certain that the final balance of the books would show that the American Republic did not die in debt to Cuba. [Applause.]

FOLLOW THE HEART OF BRUCE.

Romantic history tells us of Robert Bruce, the Norman knight and Scotland's king, who won fame for himself and glory for his race upon the bloody field of Bannockburn.

In the sunset of his life, weighted with years and weakened with wars, he recalled the vow of his youth—to be buried in holy ground at Jerusalem.

Calling about him a few of his most faithful knights and retainers, they set forth on that last pilgrimage. But, weakened by age, the old king died upon the journey. His last command to the living was that his heart be buried by the sepulchre at Jerusalem. His companions opened the dead king's breast, took therefrom his heart, and placing it in a golden casket set on toward Jerusalem to bury it in holy ground.

On the sands of the desert that little band of the faithful was overtaken by a vast horde of Saracens. As death stared them in the face, and while the heathen flaunted his banner in the face of the Christian, those few of the faithful gathered for the last charge. As they rallied their broken ranks about the tattered standard of the dead king the oldest knight among them raised the golden casket high above his head and flung it far out in the midst of the enemy, and shouted: "Sons of Scotland, follow the heart of Bruce!" And thus the kilted chivalry of Scotland followed the heart of Bruce to the death.

In this hour let those turn back who will. Faithful unto death, we will gather up in our arms the sacred principles of our party, and with its unsullied banner waving above our heads, we take our stand in the pass behind which lie the unguarded interests and industries of this Republic! [Prolonged applause on the floor of the House and in the galleries.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PIERCE] is recognized for thirty minutes.

[Mr. PIERCE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I did not at first intend to engage in this debate, but circumstances have arisen that prompt me to state some reasons why I shall vote for this bill, which, even if not amended, is intended to reduce the tariff on the trade between Cuba and the United States by 20 per cent of the present rates. Being a Democrat and believing in the principles of the Democratic party, I shall vote for the amendment to be offered by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN], who has given this question very careful study, it being to make the reduction 40 instead of 20 per cent. I shall vote for other amendments to be offered for the purpose of improving this bill. If opportunity be presented to me, I shall vote to remove the differential, which is 12½ cents on 100 pounds of sugar, which now goes to the American sugar trust.

So far I have heard no man deny that the sugar trust gets the benefit of that part of the tariff known as the differential. If that is true, and if, as the evidence shows, this sugar trust absolutely fixes the price of sugar in this country, then it seems to me that if those gentlemen whom we denominate "the beet-sugar people" in this controversy are hostile to the sugar trust, reason and patriotism should require them to unite with us to remove this differential on all refined sugar, which is a part, I will not say of the earnings, but of the accumulations of the sugar trust. A few votes from the Republican side of the House with the solid Democratic membership can destroy this differential and thus certainly cheapen sugar to the American consumer.

The opportunity is going to be presented in one form or another, and, so far as I am concerned, I agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND]. I feel that the Chair ought to hold the proposition to which I refer as germane to the bill, this being a bill touching the tariff on imports, and shall, should the ruling of the Chair be adverse to that position, vote with pleasure to overrule the Chair. And certainly, if there is a member on the other side of the House who is really against trusts, when this opportunity is offered him to strike this trust, if he is true to his constituents and true to his utterances on this floor, he ought to vote with us on the proposition. Let him not go back to his constituents and say he was afraid to vote against the ruling of the Chair, that he was afraid to vote against the trusts on an appeal from the Chairman of this committee.

Mr. Chairman, we do not contend that this is a Democratic bill. All that we contend is that it tends in a Democratic direction. There is not a Democrat in all this country who would seriously contend that a tariff which leaves a tax of more than 70 per cent upon sugar and more than 100 per cent upon tobacco coming into this country could be considered Democratic. The Republicans do not so hold, but finding no other weapon with which to fight their own colleagues in this matter, some of the Republicans endeavor to arouse party prejudice by charging that this bill is a Democratic proposition.

Sir, if the Democrats had formulated this bill, if we had presented to this House a bill touching the revenues of this Government, you would find in it this differential removed; you would find it proposing to abolish the duty upon those goods which come into competition with articles known throughout this land to be made and controlled by trusts; you would find it reducing many of the tariff schedules and cheapening manufactured goods to the consumers; and in such case the beet-sugar men might well call it a Democratic measure. But how can they charge a bill as being Democratic when it leaves a tax of more than 90 per cent upon the value of the exports of the island of Cuba to this country?

When the beet-sugar people of the West and the cane-sugar people of the South are selling their raw sugar for 3½ cents a pound, it does seem they should be willing that the poor, struggling Cubans should get 2 cents a pound for their sugar. And yet, because a Republican committee have seen fit to report a bill that will permit those Cuban sugar producers to get a little more money for their sugar, these beet-sugar men and cane-sugar men hold up their hands in holy horror, and not only do they appear to be dissatisfied with getting themselves 3½ cents a pound for their sugar, but they are unwilling for the poor Cubans to get 2 cents a pound; for, gentlemen, understand thoroughly that our beet-sugar growers and our cane-sugar growers, favored and petted by this Government, get now not only the price of the world sugar market, but the added price of the protective tariff upon sugar.

They receive over one cent and a half a pound more than the Cuban sugar growers. The protective tariff is from $1.68½ to $1.82½ on ordinary raw sugar, according to its saccharine strength, and $1.95 on refined sugar per hundred pounds. This shows the differential in favor of refined sugar of 12½ cents per hundred pounds. Our sugar growers have largely reaped the advantage of this tax, while our consumers have borne its burdens, being compelled to pay for all their sugar practically twice as much as the Englishman pays for his sugar. Yet our sugar growers object to our own people getting their sugar cheaper, and they object to the Cuban grower being enabled by Congress to get more for his sugar. We are told that the price of the Cuban's raw sugar on board ship in Habana is less than $1.75 per hundred pounds.

Mr. Chairman, coming from that section of this country that was devastated during the civil war, I have seen our people, when their substance had been destroyed by the vicissitudes and the sacrifices of war, come out of the ashes of their destitution and build anew their fortunes until to-day they stand with head erect, proud of their past and confident of their future. But, Mr. Chairman, if there had been some higher power than ours that could thirty or thirty-five years ago have offered to us the opportunity of getting a little more for our great crops, the opportunity to add 20 per cent to their prices, we would have welcomed it as a blessing, and we would have stood erect long before we did in business and in enterprise.

We see these Cubans who have struggled for years for liberty, having, with the aid of this great country, achieved their independence, with their homes destroyed and their plantations ruined. We see them now struggling onward and upward in the battle for bread. Humanity bids us to extend to them the glad hand of help and encouragement in that struggle. I would not leave them to conditions under which they can sell their sugar for only about $1.60 a hundred pounds in their own market, which the testimony shows, I believe, is less than actual cost of production.

We still have a power over Cuba that prevents her from entering into trade relations with other nations of the earth against the wishes and consent of this country. As long as we hold a power supreme over Cuba in any respect, when we are legislating and have it in our power to help her people, I believe that the common principles of honesty require us to help them in every way that we can. Neither would I adopt the policy that has been asserted, as I understand, by the distinguished gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], who announced that he would support this bill if it were coupled with an invitation to Cuba to come in and be a part of this great nation of ours.

Mr. Chairman, I am not an annexationist; I would not to-day vote to annex Cuba. I do not believe that it is the best policy for liberty in the world or for the benefit of humanity to bring all the peoples of the earth under one government. I believe I would be safe in making the assertion that there never has been a tyrant or a conqueror of nations that did not have the dream in his mind to bring all the people of the earth under one sway. But that is not the thought of liberty-loving people.

You want independent, liberty-loving, and liberty-enjoying States if you would have humanity most greatly blessed. I believe a country should be great enough and powerful enough to enforce her just demands, and to defend herself against unjust encroachments. When a country has that size and that power it has all the size and power that should be required for the greatest development of society. If larger and greater than that it becomes well-nigh impossible for its laws to equally bless all the people, or for its burdens to be equitably levied upon all the people. Why should we want Cuba, or Mexico, or Canada? Do we need other countries for our protection and defense? We need none of them. Do we want other countries in order that our great trusts may plunder them? We want none for that purpose.

Do we want more subjects which will constantly require legislation, so that each act of Congress will be passed with less and less consideration as the years go by? I would have Cuba as Mexico is, a prosperous, self-governing republic. I would have Canada a prosperous, self-governing republic. I would have the Dutch republics free and independent from every outside influence. I care not what state may claim the power to govern another state, whether it is a people who have a written constitution and a president or a people who have a king, it is an imperial power that is claimed and sought to be exercised. Whenever the people of one country undertake to extend their powers over the people of another country and to deny the right of self-government to a separate people in a separate community liberty ends and tyranny begins. I will deny the right of such powers in my country just as I would deny it in an empire of Alexander or Cæsar.

I believe that independent Cuba, with her natural resources, would be, in time of peace, our best customer, and in time of war a practical ally for all purposes. Those great reasons that actuated the fathers of this country in wanting Cuba to some day become a part of our Republic no longer exist. When Jefferson dreamed of Cuba becoming some day as a ripe apple that would fall into our lap, she belonged to a foreign country, and rather than see her remain in foreign hands it was natural for Americans to want to see her under our flag. The possibility of Cuba passing again into foreign hands has been destroyed.

Again, in those days an enemy could have concentrated a fleet in some Cuban port, and with munitions of war could have suddenly pounced upon our country without notice to the American people. That condition is not now possible. Continents are tied by cables and cities by telegraph, and no fleet can start from an European port without its destination being known within twenty-four hours in every city of the United States. Danger of sudden attack, which used to make every nation desire to grasp the outlying ports to prevent others from having them, is not so serious as formerly.

Surely the country does not want the solving of another race problem thrown into its politics or its civilization, nor does it wish to extend or enlarge the race problem already on its hands. For these reasons, as well as others, I do not favor the annexation of Cuba. It seems to me that the democratic, the liberty-loving, and the humanitarian spirit of the American people should want Cuba to be an independent, self-governing republic, just as they wanted her to be when the Teller amendment was adopted, before they had been stampeded by victories and war cries from their best principles and highest aspirations.

Let her be free, and, with proper trade relations between the two countries, we will sell them practically their entire imports.

Mr. LANDIS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. LANDIS. The gentleman stated that the Platt amendment——

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I referred to the Teller resolution just then.

Mr. LANDIS. In your remarks a moment ago you stated that the Platt amendment prohibited the people of the Cuban republic from making any treaties or trade relations with any other nation without the consent of the United States. Was that your statement?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I was not pretending to quote it. I think I can find it in a minute, and, if the gentleman prefers, will read it.

Mr. LANDIS. I should like to have the gentleman read that article of the Platt amendment which makes that provision.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The gentleman is aware that the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] incorporated that in his remarks, and I will incorporate the same provisions in my speech.

Mr. LANDIS. I know that the gentleman does not want to misrepresent the terms of that amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I do not.

Mr. LANDIS. The statement has been frequently made during this debate; but a careful reading of the Platt amendment does not bear out the assertion.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The gentleman undoubtedly has the Platt amendment before him, and I will ask him to read it now.

Mr. LANDIS. These are the provisions of the Platt amendment:

I.

That the government of Cuba shall never enter into any treaty or other compact with any foreign power or powers which will impair or tend to impair the independence of Cuba, nor in any manner authorize or permit any foreign power or powers to obtain by colonization or for military or naval purposes or otherwise, lodgment in or control over any portion of said island.

II.

That said government shall not assume or contract any public debt, to pay the interest upon which, and to make reasonable sinking fund provision for the ultimate discharge of which, the ordinary revenues of the island, after defraying the current expenses of government, shall be inadequate.

III.

That the government of Cuba consents that the United States may exercise the right to intervene for the preservation of Cuban independence, the maintenance of a government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty, and for discharging the obligations with respect to Cuba imposed by the treaty of Paris on the United States, now to be assumed and undertaken by the government of Cuba.

IV.

That all acts of the United States in Cuba during its military occupancy thereof are ratified and validated, and all lawful rights acquired thereunder shall be maintained and protected.

V.

That the government of Cuba will execute, and as far as necessary extend, the plans already devised or other plans to be mutually agreed upon, for the sanitation of the cities of the island, to the end that a recurrence of epidemic and infectious diseases may be prevented, thereby assuring protection to the people and commerce of Cuba, as well as to the commerce of the Southern ports of the United States and the people residing therein.

VI.

That the Isle of Pines shall be omitted from the proposed constitutional boundaries of Cuba, the title thereto being left to future adjustment by treaty.

VII.

That to enable the United States to maintain the independence of Cuba, and to protect the people thereof, as well as for its own defense, the government of Cuba will sell or lease to the United States lands necessary for coaling or naval stations at certain specified points, to be agreed upon with the President of the United States.

VIII.

That by way of further assurance the government of Cuba will embody the foregoing provisions in a permanent treaty with the United States.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. That is all right. The only point I intended to make is that we had retained and had required Cuba in her constitution to recognize the supreme control of the United States over Cuba.

Mr. LANDIS. Not at all.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I do not mean in all respects.

Mr. LANDIS. In any respect. Cuba is as free now to contract trade relations with foreign countries as is the United States.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I dispute that, for Cuba must exercise certain of her sovereign powers in conformity to the will of the United States. Cuba, under the Platt amendment, has not the same sovereign power to deal with other nations of this earth as the United States have. I believe she ought to have it, but under that amendment Cuba has embodied into her constitution provisions giving this country power over certain sovereign functions that ought to reside exclusively in the Republic of Cuba.

Now, the point I make is that since we have that sovereign power we are in a sense the guardian or the protector or the supervisor of Cuba, and having that supervision in any respect, we ought to consider the good of the Cubans in our legislation; and when this opportunity to benefit the Cuban sugar grower is presented to us we ought to support this bill, even if we can not improve it, for the simple reason that this bill with 20 per cent reduction in it is better than the Dingley rates without reduction.

The Platt amendment itself is not in harmony, in my judgment, with our resolution which led to the war with Spain. That resolution declared:

That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

And further:

That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island, except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

Notwithstanding that, we afterwards compelled her to adopt the Platt amendment. In view of this history Cuba may well expect the Platt amendment to be so construed by our country, if it sees fit to do so, as to keep her under such control as will prevent beneficial trade relations by treaty with any other country. Does not the Platt amendment gag and bind Cuba hand and foot, to use the expression applied by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], when he so ably maintained the position I now take? It provides that Cuba shall not enter into treaties with other countries which tend to impair her independence; that she shall not do certain things for which the "ordinary revenues" of the island are not sufficient; that we may intervene to maintain a government adequate for the protection of life, property, and liberty, and for discharging certain obligations, etc. The maintenance of a government includes the power to levy taxes. Who is to be the judge of the occasions and conditions which, under that amendment, will justify our interference, except ourselves?

Suppose Cuba should attempt to enter into trade relations with Germany or England which would give the German or the Englishman 20 per cent advantage over us in Cuban import duties, and thus secure to the foreigner the entire Cuban market to the exclusion of ourselves; would this Government permit it? Would our Government allow Cuba to give her markets to Europe exclusively, and, if not, by what authority would we prevent it except by the authority of the Platt amendment? No doubt, then, the "maintenance of an adequate government" or "ordinary revenue" or something else in the Platt amendment would be the basis of our interference, so I conclude that Cuba can not enter into trade relations with other countries against our consent.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does not the gentleman know that the Platt amendment, in so far as it does interfere with the sovereignty of Cuba, improves instead of injures her condition?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I do not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And that every single provision of that amendment is an advantage to Cuba. Does not the gentleman know that?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I do not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If the gentleman will read the amendment, perhaps he might be satisfied of that.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I have read the amendment, and I deny that it is for the best interests of any people on this earth for any power outside of her own people to retain in their grasp any vestige of imperialism over her. But the point is not whether we think the powers we have over Cuba are for her advantage, but whether they prevent her free conduct.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I should like to have the gentleman point out a single clause in the Platt amendment that tends to interfere with the development of Cuba, if the gentleman can do it.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I will say that the links of bondage, such as I have mentioned, that this country holds or claims to hold over Cuba will prevent her people from working out their own salvation in their own way.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is nothing but a generality.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. It is a generality true as everlasting truth.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It does not even glitter.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I did not intend that it should glitter against the brilliancy of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Pick out a clause in that amendment that tends to interfere with the development of Cuba, if you can.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I have stated that whenever one government holds a power over another people, that power, if it has any force whatever, is a constraint upon them, and instead of leaving the abilities, skill, and energies of those people to work out their own salvation it, in certain respects, constrains them. It limits their efforts and aspirations.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. As I understand, that is all the answer that the gentleman can make?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. That is all I ever intended to make.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And it is no answer at all.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. In your opinion.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. JENKINS. Is it not a fact that under all the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States the Government of the United States is exercising absolute dominion over the island of Cuba?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is correct. Until we vacate the island, I understand we do exercise all powers of government there; but I understand that orders have already been given to vacate the island and turn it over to the independent people of Cuba.

Mr. JENKINS. Anticipating that, will the gentleman agree with the gentleman from Indiana in saying that to-day the island of Cuba can enter into reciprocal treaties and trade relations with all foreign nations of the world?

Mr. LANDIS. The gentleman from Indiana did not say that the island of Cuba could now enter into these trade relations.

Mr. JENKINS. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. LANDIS. The gentleman from Indiana did say that there was nothing in the Platt amendment that prohibited Cuba—the Republic of Cuba—from entering into treaties with other nations.

Mr. JENKINS. The Platt amendment is entirely anticipatory, and has no effect until the government is established.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I do not believe that we own Cuba——

Mr. LANDIS. I do not see that this has anything to do with the remark I made.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN (continuing). In the sense in which the gentleman from Wisconsin has so ably contended on two separate occasions in this House. I do not believe that the fact that Cuban independence was achieved by the American armies makes Cuban territory our territory. I do not believe that the allegiance of a people and the sovereignty of a country can be rightfully acquired in any such manner.

So, Mr. Chairman, as I was about to conclude, I think the proposition before us to-day is not whether this is a Democratic measure, not whether it is a breach in the high protective wall, but whether this measure is better than the present law. The able gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who has spoken against the bill, admitted, if I understood his argument correctly, that the Cuban planters would get the benefit of this reduction.

Mr. SHAFROTH. In part.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I understood the part was practically the whole.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think they will get the majority. I believe the major part—the lion's share—will go to the American Sugar Refining Company.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Then you will vote with me for striking off the differential?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly I will.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I think other gentlemen who occupy your position on this matter ought to vote with you.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think they will, too.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I hope they will. [Laughter.] But I do not believe the sugar trust will get the benefit of this reduction. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LONG] clearly showed that it will not.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen talk of the tariff upon manufactured articles made in the South. If I remember this schedule properly, the average upon cotton goods which are made in the South is about 35 per cent. Should we reduce the tariff on all sugar 20 per cent, it would still leave to the American sugar grower 70 per cent protection, or twice the amount of tariff on such goods as would compete with the manufactured goods of the South. A 20 per cent reduction in the tariff on tobacco would leave the Connecticut and Pennsylvania tobacco growers with a tariff of over 100 per cent upon Cuban tobacco, which competes with them.

And so I see no reason why we should not give these Cuban people necessary relief at this time. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] says, I would be glad to vote for a larger reduction. I would be glad to vote for a general tariff reduction. I wish we had an opportunity here and now to reduce the protection upon trust-made goods that have been discussed so much in this debate.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Would the gentleman vote to reduce the duty on cotton goods, that he says are made in his State, and that now have a tariff of 35 per cent?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I was speaking of the schedules in which there is enormous protection upon things which are manufactured and sold by trusts, and believe that they should be the first reduced.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. That does not answer my question.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I know it does not answer your question the way you want it answered. I would tear down your high protective tariffs that have fostered trusts, which enable the trusts to rob the American people, while they sell their manufactured goods on the banks of the Danube and the Rhine, the Amazon and the Orinoco at cheaper prices than they do to the people of this country. I would also state to the gentleman that there is no charge that the cotton goods of the South are controlled by trusts.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Does the gentleman think that cotton schedule should be reduced?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. That is the lowest schedule, or certainly one of the lowest schedules, in the whole Dingley bill, and I ask the gentleman if fairness and justice would not require that you first bring down these other schedules?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I am not wanting a reduction of the schedules.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Do you not think that it would be the fair thing to first bring down other schedules?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Oh, oh!

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The gentleman knows that would be the fair thing, and yet he wants me, because cotton goods happen to be made by manufacturers in my State, to say that I am in favor of the reduction on cotton goods.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I wanted to get the gentleman's position.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Our manufacturers have natural advantages unsurpassed on this continent, and they go out into the markets of China and elsewhere and sell their goods in competition, not only with New England, but with the English manufacturers. Protection is not their reliance. I will favor a reduction of the tariff to a proper revenue basis. I would not shrink from voting to reduce the cotton schedule if consideration shows it too high, but I would first insist on removing the protection to trust-made goods.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks that the time of the gentleman from North Carolina be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I want to say to the gentleman that the New England cotton manufacturers have no envious feelings toward the manufacturers of the South; they have been willing to go there and invest their capital in your State and other Southern States.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Very well, and yet I ask the gentleman from Connecticut if New England is not trying to have the Constitution of the United States amended so as to authorize Congress to limit the hours of labor in the Southern cotton mills? The late Nelson Dingley, the greatest protective tariff supporter at the time of his death, stated from his seat in this House that the protective theory did not affect Southern cotton mills. He stated, in answer to inquiries made by myself, when he was explaining the conditions that brought about the Lewiston strike, that the class of goods made in the Southern cotton mills had no serious competition from foreign goods.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. FINLEY. The question was asked in reference to the amount of money that the people of New England had invested in the Southern cotton mills. I want to ask the gentleman if the percentage is not very small? In South Carolina, as I recollect it, it is less than 15 per cent, and I think it is equally small in the gentleman's own State.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman is correct. The most successful manufacturers of North Carolina are natives to the State. We have some enterprising men from the North in our midst, but the people most thoroughly identified with the manufacturing interests of the State, like the Holts, the Williamsons, the Erwins, the Gants, the Frieses, the Ruffins, and others, are North Carolinians to the manor born. Such are the men whose energy and intelligence are carrying North Carolina and the South rapidly to the front in cotton manufacturing. Yet we welcome northern capital when it comes to us for good purposes. We have no resentment against the people of the North. But I was proceeding, when interrupted, to say that the American people are entitled to relief from the tariff that enables the great trusts to rob them.

I want the props knocked out from under the trusts; I want them to sell their goods as cheap to us as they sell them in England or Germany, as cheap as they sell them abroad. The gentleman from Connecticut knows that Mr. Schwab testified before the Industrial Commission that the American manufacturers generally sell their goods to foreigners cheaper than they do to our people. John W. Gates, the head of the barbed-wire and nail trust, testified to the same effect. There was testimony before that Commission that our manufacturers had sold steel rails in Europe cheaper by many dollars in the ton than they sold them to the American people. The evidence was abundant to such conduct.

That is the kind of robbery that the protective tariff has enabled the trusts to commit upon the people of the country. We are going to have an opportunity to strike at one trust, and I hope we can get an opportunity to strike at all of them. We will certainly have an opportunity to strike at the great sugar trust. We want to reduce the price of sugar to the consumers of this country, to 80,000,000 people. We have nothing against the sugar grower, either of Louisiana or of Michigan. We have no malice in trying to cheapen sugar to the American consumer, or in trying to aid the Cuban in his extremity. And in the name of justice we would destroy the unjust powers of trusts. I speak for the great body of the American people in this attack upon the trusts, and upon the protective tariff that fosters trusts. I speak for suffering humanity in Cuba, and think we should vote for this bill even if we fail to amend and improve it. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, while the pending measure originated with the Republicans and is said to have the active support of the President, some members of the Cabinet, and a majority of the Committee on Ways and Means which reported the bill, it has ceased to be wholly a partisan affair, for the reason that the Democrats on the Ways and Means Committee are divided, and all preliminary votes thus far taken on the floor of the House which served to test the sentiment of the members, showed that the Democrats were by no means a unit for or against the bill. Indeed, it involves economic principles upon which good men and loyal partisans on other and purely partisan questions are divided.

I have regretted to hear some things uttered by the so-called leaders of the House when advocating the bill which tended to deter those younger in years or service, or both, from opposing the measure in debate. I grant that it would seem presumptuous to challenge men who have grown gray, and presumably wise, in the legislative service of their country, were it not for the fact that men of equal age and equal legislative experience, and presumably of equal wisdom, are opposed to the bill. Again, it is a matter of common knowledge that the bill is not a child of the House. It did not have its conception in the Ways and Means Committee. It is the mental offspring of two men, neither of whom have had legislative experience in Congress.

Again, the testimony of the written page of the Republican party's history is against the contention of the advocates of the principle involved as specifically applied in this proposed law, and, finally, each and every member, however young in years or experience in Congressional service, is charged in his representative capacity with responsibilities to his constituents and to the country which he can not wholly delegate to another. Hence I feel emboldened to speak and to declare my opposition to the measure, because, among other objectionable features, it diverts from the Treasury of the United States about $8,000,000 which would otherwise come to it and brings no appreciable equivalent. No single commodity which the people buy, with possibly the single exception of salt, is more universally used than sugar, and yet it is conceded by advocates and opponents alike that this concession of 20 per cent of duty on raw sugar, amounting annually to about $8,000,000, will not in the least reduce the cost of refined sugar to the consumer.

I am opposed to the measure because I do not believe it will be of material benefit to the people of Cuba, and not because I am unwilling to aid that people as such. The testimony relied on even by those who contend for the concession is that a large percentage of the eight millions will go to the sugar trust; not a small per cent will go to wealthy Americans who own or control large cane holdings in the island; no inconsiderable per cent to Spaniards who live in Spain, but who have large real estate and sugar-cane properties in Cuba, and because citizens of England and even of the Orient are owners of plantations in that island. While one-third of the population of Cuba is colored, 92.2 per cent of the sugar lands are owned or controlled by the whites and but 3.6 per cent by colored. Who will get the benefit of the present crop? Surely not the one-third composing the colored population, for they have in it no appreciable interest, but the whites, and the rich whites and foreigners at that. Prior to the war of 1898 there were but 1,110 sugar plantations in Cuba, while there were 8,875 tobacco farms; and yet 47 per cent of her products was sugar and only 9 per cent tobacco, showing conclusively that the sugar plantations are owned or controlled by a comparatively few men, and that under the provisions of this bill these few will reap in large part the benefit of the millions it indirectly gives to Cuba.

It is declared by men of experience on the island that the small landowner or renter can not successfully compete with the large owner or renter. I am opposed to the bill because, as a measure of relief, it will not only fail of the object in view, but because it is unworthy the great nation that, in the name of "humanity," makes the tender. Three months ago many American newspapers were portraying the dire distress that prevailed in Cuba. Editorials were written and marked copies of the papers sent to members of Congress, appealing to this body to act and to act quickly in aid of "starving Cuba." At that very time those representing the sugar interests of Cuba were testifying before the Ways and Means Committee that labor was never better employed, nor were wages ever so high; that everybody who wanted work could have it, and that the prevailing rate of wages was higher on the plantations in Cuba than on the farms in the United States.

But it was said that unless the planters could get relief they would be in great distress. When are they going to get it for this year's crop? Mr. E. F. Atkins, the star witness for the concessionists—"the Carnegie of the sugar interest in Cuba"—says that "the sugar-crop season is covered from January 1 to June 1." The law that is calculated to bring relief before the 1st of June—forty-five days hence—awaits to be enacted by the American Congress, and a government which has no existence, and will not have for at least thirty-four days from now, must first meet the conditions imposed before the hands of the United States, filled with "generosity and justice and humanity," will be opened and extended to Cuba. Does anyone believe that these conditions can be so met as to give relief to the people of Cuba, the growers of the cane, for this year's crop?

Then, what follows? Of necessity, this: That for the purpose of securing reciprocal trade relations with Cuba for one crop of sugar the "President is hereby authorized, as soon as may be after the establishment of an independent government in Cuba and the enactment by said government of the immigration, exclusion, and contract labor laws of the United States, to enter into negotiations with said government with a view to the arrangement of a commercial agreement in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions may be secured" for one crop of sugar. These are, in effect, the provisions of the present measure, and it is beneath the dignity, much less the generosity, of the United States of America. But what conditions must the new Cuban government meet at our behest? First, she must survey her own possessions, "with millions of acres of the richest and best land on the globe yet untouched by the plow and a climate unsurpassed for the growth and development of sugar cane;" with 47 per cent of her product gathered from her cane fields; with but 2 per cent of her tillable land under sugar cultivation; with her present source of labor supply taxed to its utmost; with the world for a market for all she can raise, the United States comes to her and for the poor privilege of 20 per cent reduction on her exports to this country for one year she must not only reciprocate the favor in so far as she can, but in addition she must "enact immigration, exclusion, and contract labor laws fully as restrictive as our own."

Mr. Atkins, the gentleman before referred to, says "the supply of labor and rates of wages in the future are now most serious questions to the sugar producer in Cuba and present the greatest obstacles to reducing the cost." Under our strict immigration laws you would not only forbid Cuba from importing labor by contract from tropical and subtropical countries and from the Orient, upon which in former years she has largely relied, but from any foreign country. Even negroes of the United States, who could be easily utilized by Cuba, greatly to their mutual advantage, are barred out, for we are to Cuba an alien people. We will compel her to forbid, under heavy penalties, "any importation by a person or company or corporation by prepaying transportation or in any way assisting the migration of any alien or aliens, any foreigner or foreigners into Cuba under contract or agreement made previous to the importation of such alien or aliens."

I am opposed to this bill because it is not in line with the principles or practice of the Republican party as applied to reciprocity or protection. Treaties of reciprocity were negotiated with the Republic of Mexico in 1882 and with Spain in 1884 highly advantageous, as was believed, to the United States. Both of these treaties failed to secure the approval of Congress, and failed, said Secretary Blaine, "for the express reason that both provided for the free admission of sugar."

In 1889 the balance of trade with Europe was largely in favor of the United States. But that year we imported from Cuba $52,000,000 and exported to that country $11,000,000. In the same year our imports from all Latin-American countries amounted to $216,000,000, while our exports to the same countries were but $74,000,000, exceeding our gain with the rest of the world and throwing the balance of trade against the United States. This state of things led to the assembling of representatives of all the American republics with a view of conferring together and, if possible, establishing reciprocal trade relations between those republics and the United States. As is well known, 15 out of 17 republics represented in the conference desired to enter into reciprocal trade relations with this country.

Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State, in a letter to Senator FRYE in June, 1890, said that while the McKinley tariff bill was pending in the House he "sought an interview in February with the eight Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means and endeavored to convince them that it would be expedient and wise to leave to the President, as the treaty-making power, to see what advantageous arrangements of reciprocal trade could be effected. I was unable to persuade the committee to take my view. It is, I think, a very great mistake to oppose the reciprocal proposition touching sugar from the fear that it may conflict in some way with the policy of protection." Who were these eight Republicans who defeated in the Ways and Means Committee, and, therefore, in the House of Representatives, the great Secretary's scheme of reciprocity with the Latin-American republics because the reciprocal proposition touching sugar might in some way conflict with the policy of protection?

Among the eight names was that of William McKinley, of Ohio, the then chairman of that important committee and afterwards President of the United States; Nelson Dingley, of Maine, later chairman of the committee, and who died while still at its head, mourned by men of all parties as a wise, sagacious, and patriotic statesman; Joseph McKenna, of California, afterwards a member of the Cabinet and now a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; JULIUS C. BURROWS, of Michigan, now a Senator of the United States; John H. Gear, of Iowa, who became a Senator of the United States, and who died while an incumbent of that great office, and SERENO E. PAYNE, of New York, the present honored chairman of the committee with which the names of McKinley and Dingley are inseparably associated. Surely these were not "young men" nor "novices in legislation." Yet they stood then where the minority of the Republicans in this House, touching the measure under consideration, stand now.

Defeated in the House, the Secretary renewed his efforts in the Senate and succeeded in having a resolution referred to the Committee on Finance which declared in effect that "the ports of the United States should be free and open to all products of any nation on the American hemisphere to like reciprocal privileges." When it was proposed to put wool upon the free list, John Sherman lifted his voice and effectively exerted his powerful influence in favor of protecting the Ohio wool grower against the dangerous competition of the Argentine Republic. Other Senators followed the example of Mr. Sherman, and finally the amendment proposed by Senator ALDRICH was adopted, which in substance put on the reciprocal list such articles as are peculiar to the Latin-American countries, as sugar, molasses, tea, and coffee, and which did not come in competition with our peculiar products. From Germany there was obtained an agreement to allow the admission of American hogs and pork free on condition that we permit her beet sugar to enter our ports without duty. From Austria-Hungary there was, under like conditions, secured the "most-favored-nation" treaty for all our products.

Our Democratic friends, who will now very largely support the present proposed concession, enacted in 1894 a tariff law by which all reciprocity agreements made under the McKinley law were repealed. The Republican tariff act of 1897 provided for the conditional reopening of trade relations.

These reciprocal advantages were secured with the great nations mentioned because their products were exchanged for those of our country which did not directly compete, and hence such exchange was to the mutual advantage of all concerned. That, as I understand it, is the very essence of reciprocity. For that kind of reciprocity McKinley, and Dingley, and BURROWS, and McKenna, and Gear, and PAYNE argued and voted ten years ago. [Applause.] Who is in line in this discussion with the splendid traditions of the Republican party? Some of you gentlemen are in the attitude of defending the manufacturing interests which have grown to colossal proportions and which in their giant strength are able to compete with the world, while you would, as we fear, jeopardize the beet-sugar industry, which is an agricultural interest in the early stages of its development.

We ask you to stand by this child of the American farm interest and protect it until it can successfully compete with its older and more favored rivals. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] would use the apothecary scales and undertake to weigh to the hundredth part of a cent the difference in cost in producing sugar in the United States and in Cuba in order to figure out how we can stand this reduction in competition with Cuba. In Michigan, for example, farms are worth $25, $40, $50, $75, and even $100 per acre, and against these you would put the farms of Cuba worth $5, $10, $15, and $25 per acre. Our splendid houses, built to endure and to bring comfort and good cheer in our rigorous climate, you would place over against the wretched shacks, mere hovels, in the agricultural districts of Cuba, and costing with their furniture from $5 to $15.

Our highways, our schoolhouses, our colleges, our churches, and our civilization you would put over against a country without roads, without an established school system, without colleges, and with but few churches, and with a civilization—the fruit of four hundred years of Spanish sovereignty—in which more than 10 per cent of her people are acknowledged illegitimates and 66 per cent unable to read and write. You do not need to use the apothecaries' scales to determine the difference between the civilization of Cuba and the civilization of Michigan or of the United States. [Applause.] But gentlemen say: "Would you not help Cuba?" Yes; we want to help the people of Cuba and not the sugar trust, not the rich owners of plantations in that island who live in luxury in New York, or Boston, or Madrid, or even in Habana. We would help to lift up the common people and not the wealthy aristocrats who leech the blood from the common people. [Applause.]

I am opposed to this bill because it contravenes the well-established doctrine of protection and the usages of the Republican party relative to developing industries which are in competition with like industries in foreign countries. Mr. Blaine in a speech at Augusta, Me., in August, 1890, said he was in favor of "expansion of trade with countries where we can find profitable exchanges." He sought foreign trade, he said, not by any means "that would shock or disturb home industries." The arguments of the fathers of the American protective system invariably pointed in the direction of the development of American industries until competition with foreign products should be practicable. "The highest aim of their economical philosophy was that the industry shall be first established, strengthened, and then highly developed and then gradually be brought into competition with older competing industries in the markets of the world under favorable conditions of reciprocal trade." In his much-quoted speech at Buffalo President McKinley said:

> We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor. If, perchance, some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should not they be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad?

It is claimed by some of the Republican protectionists that the proposed reduction will not interfere with the beet-sugar industry where already established, because it will not lower the price to the consumer. The Democratic friends of the bill favor it because it is 20 per cent nearer free trade. While one member of the Ways and Means Committee says it will do no harm, "that it hurts no American industry," another of that committee, of long and honorable service in the House, says anybody who can add two and two together must know that any reduction will do harm. But granted, for argument's sake, that the proposed reduction will not injuriously affect the prosperity of established plants for the manufacture of beet sugar, no one has had the temerity to assume or undertake to prove that it will not deter, if it does not absolutely prohibit, the further development of that industry. The beet-sugar industry is essentially a farming industry.

In portions of Michigan and in other sections of the country the prosperity of the farmers is bound up in it. How can we justify taking away that prosperity and giving it to an alien when that alien is concededly not in distress and when with him labor is abundant and at good wages? To do this is a violation of the implied obligation of the Government which, through its authorized agent, the Agricultural Department, has in various ways encouraged the institution and development of the beet-sugar industry, a violation of the implied obligation of the Congress to stand by that industry after it has repeatedly made liberal appropriations for the dissemination of information on the subject, the free distribution of seed to the farmers, and the admission free of duty of beet-sugar machinery of foreign manufacture. It is a violation of the principles and practice of the Republican party from its beginning to this hour, touching the doctrine of a protective tariff and its relation to developing industries. It is a violation of the solemn promises of the Republican party in national convention assembled. The party declared:

> We condemn the present [Democratic] Administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country.

The farmers accepted that declaration in good faith, and in so doing gave us their confidence and their votes. Now to betray them by doing the very thing for which we condemned our political opponents would be a piece of perfidy to which I do not wish to be a party.

We talk about our moral obligation to Cuba. Are we not under some moral obligation to the people who have honored us and trusted us and whose interest we have promised to serve?

But "the Republican party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use." We said this in our national platform in 1896. Can this be done? We will answer in part by what has been done in a single State and what promises to be done in others under the promised protection by the Republican party.

From 1898 to 1901 the beet-sugar factories in Michigan increased from 1 to 13. During the same length of time the acreage planted to beets increased from 4,200 to 66,400. While Michigan has been classed among the wheat-producing States, in 1901 the amount received by farmers for sugar beets was almost 50 per cent of the amount received for wheat in 1899. In Michigan alone there are 24 other factories now projected, involving an investment of $13,200,000, with capacity for a daily output of 13,200 tons of refined sugar. For some of these the money has all been raised; for others, partly raised; in some cases the contracts have been let; in every case activity has ceased. There is at present a perfect paralysis in the development of the industry. In the country at large, on the authority of Mr. Saylor, a special agent of the Agricultural Department, approximately 100 beet-sugar plants are at this time projected in the United States. That we can produce cane and beet sugar in our own country with profit to the grower and the manufacturer and with economy to the people is conceded. The increase in the production of beet sugar, as compared with that of cane, and the increase in the consumption of sugar furnish a subject for reflection to any thoughtful mind in the presence of the conceded fact that our country can and will produce, if the industry is properly protected, every pound of sugar our people use or are likely to use at a price below that which they now pay.

During the last sixty years the world's production of cane sugar has increased from 1,100,000 tons to 3,060,634 tons, or 278 per cent. Beet sugar during the same length of time has increased from 50,000 tons to 6,138,413 tons, or 13,268 per cent.

The estimated world's product in 1902 is 10,700,000 tons. The estimated world's product of beet sugar in 1902 is 7,200,000 tons, or a little less than three-fourths of the whole.

Our consumption last year was 66 pounds per capita, at a retail of 5 cents per pound equaling $3.30. On a basis of 76,000,000 population our people paid last year for sugar $250,800,000, a large per cent of which went to growers.

It is estimated by sugar experts that in 1910 the American people will consume 4,000,000 tons, and in 1920 7,500,000 tons, for which the consumer at present prices will be paying out $700,000,000.

Whose fields shall be cultivated? To whom shall the wage be paid? Whose capital employed? What people primarily benefited in the production and consumption of this vast amount of sugar? The answer to these questions is one of the issues involved in this prolonged discussion. I trust the answer this Congress makes will be favorable to America and Americans. [Prolonged applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LITTLEFIELD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. CROOK, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

H. R. 8696. An act granting an increase of pension to William B. Rowe;

H. R. 9301. An act granting an increase of pension to Barbara McDonald;

H. R. 10044. An act granting an increase of pension to William Larzalere;

H. R. 10193. An act granting an increase of pension to John Hollister; and

H. R. 11381. An act granting an increase of pension to Abraham N. Bradfield;

On April 16, 1902:

H. R. 3418. An act granting a pension to Dennis Dyer;

H. R. 6466. An act granting a pension to Josephine M. Dustin;

H. R. 9821. An act granting a pension to John W. Moore;

H. R. 10117. An act granting a pension to Sarah H. H. Lowe;

H. R. 10289. An act granting a pension to Eliza Stewart;

H. R. 11375. An act granting a pension to Charles F. Merrill;

H. R. 1011. An act granting an increase of pension to John S. Ranlett;

H. R. 1706. An act granting an increase of pension to John E. White;

H. R. 2120. An act granting an increase of pension to Horatio N. Warren;

H. R. 2124. An act granting an increase of pension to Dewit C. McCoy;

H. R. 2770. An act granting an increase of pension to Otilla M. Smoot;

H. R. 3180. An act granting an increase of pension to Edward S. Dickson;

H. R. 5413. An act granting an increase of pension to Alfred A. Van Vliet;

H. R. 6029. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Kelly;

H. R. 6713. An act granting an increase of pension to Freeman R. E. Chanaberry; and

H. R. 7990. An act granting an increase of pension to Uriah Reams.

RECIPROCITY WITH CUBA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I am a new member, but I have no hesitation on that account in addressing this committee. It is my duty to attempt to represent my constituency as fully and well as if I had been here many years. I have the honor, in part, to represent as intelligent, progressive, and patriotic a people as any member on this floor, no matter how long his service may have been. In my action and course on this bill I believe I shall represent their desires and their sentiments.

I do feel some embarrassment, however, because I must take a position in opposition to the leaders of my party on this floor. This embarrassment is relieved to some extent, however, in the belief that my position is not antagonistic to my party and its principles and platforms, nor to the best interests of the country.

I have not spoken much or often in my short service in this body. I believe more in action than in speech, but I feel it my duty on this occasion to myself, to my constituents, and to my party associates to give some of the reasons for my position on this bill. I feel that in opposing this bill I am representing an American constituency instead of Cuban sugar barons and hybrid Americans who have gone to Cuba to enrich themselves out of her impoverished and distressed condition. [Applause.]

I respect, honor, and admire the leaders of my party on this floor. I respect, honor, and admire the Speaker of this House. He has treated me far beyond my deserts. Upon a matter of expediency or policy I would have no hesitation in following them. Upon a mere matter of judgment I would feel like yielding my opinion in deference to their maturer years and longer service. My action in this House is my own action. For it I, and I alone, am responsible to my people. When my idea of what is true Republicanism, when my judgment and my conscience differ from theirs, I would not be true to myself if I did not take my own course. I would feel that to do otherwise would lose me their respect as well as my own.

In this discussion I do not assume that my judgment is better than theirs. I do not assume that I am a better Republican than they. I do not assume that I know better what is and what is not protection than they. I have striven hard to bring myself to their view of this proposed legislation, but I can not. I may be influenced somewhat—yea, I am—by the stand taken by them some time ago. We all know what that was. We know that they stated publicly their opposition to this kind of legislation.

I was in hearty sympathy with them then. They have changed their minds. At least, they have changed their course. They ask me to follow. What reason do they give for their change? One is that public opinion and its molder, the press, are almost unanimous for this proposition. Public opinion is a great power in any country. In a republic it is the great ruling power upon any great question. No great reform has ever succeeded without the power of public opinion behind it. Many have failed for lack of its support. It is more absolute, more despotic, than the Czar of all the Russias.

The great molder, the creator, and the director of public opinion in this country is the press. It divines public thought and feeling before the public itself, yea, almost before it exists. It fans it into a flame, a whirlwind, an irresistible power, or it stifles and suppresses.

We are a sympathetic people. We are impulsive. An appeal to our sympathy is never spurned. It is often heeded and many times sways our judgment. An appeal was made for Cuba. It was alleged that it needed help. The press took up the thought, expressed it, and it was felt at every fireside in the land. The statement was not questioned. It was accepted as true that Cuba was in distress—that her people were in distress.

Of course, something must be done. The President spoke. It was alleged that our martyred President, the lovable and beloved McKinley, had promised them relief. This of itself was enough to move our people to the utmost. They stopped not to ask if it was true. They accepted it as a fact, and the tide of public opinion became a mountain billow, raging and roaring at the Committee on Ways and Means, demanding that something be done for "poor, suffering Cuba." They yielded and brought in this bill. It is a peculiar bill. It is indorsed by no one; it is approved by no one. It is not protection; it is not free trade. It is not Republican; it is not Democratic. It is a legislative makeshift, an abortion, a legislative absurdity. I am confirmed in my opposition to it because many members say, "You are right; your sentiments are mine, but I must support it."

I admit the widespread belief that aid is needed by Cuba, and I admit the belief that this bill will bring relief. I believe, however, that this thought is an entire misconception of the actual facts and conditions, and that this belief is not warranted by the terms or effect of this bill.

Let us see what the actual facts and conditions are. What is the foundation for this bill? It is alleged, first, that Cuba is in distress, and, second, that she is threatened with distress, and therefore we are under obligations to assist her. I deny that the Cuban people are in distress. I deny that they are threatened with distress, and I deny absolutely that even if they are or are likely to be in distress we are under any obligations to assist her, either legal or equitable or moral.

That they are not in distress let their own witnesses speak for them. Before giving this testimony, however, I want to call to the attention of this House and the country who have come before the committee speaking for and on behalf of the Cuban people. That these men are honorable and upright I do not doubt, but I submit that their character, business, and occupations indicate the interest that they have in this legislation. It further seems to me that it is a great strain on the imagination to conceive that they are representative of the real wants and necessities of the Cuban people. Who are they?

Edwin F. Adkins, of Boston, merchant, sugar planter, and chairman of the Associated American Interests of Cuba. The association represents 90 per cent of the total production of the island. The name does not sound very Cubanish. He is president of the Trinidad Sugar Company, which owns an estate producing 10,000 tons of sugar annually. He owns individually an estate of 14,000 acres, producing 12,000 tons annually. It would be too bad, indeed, to allow him to suffer. [Laughter.]

Louis V. Place, Cuban delegate on economic affairs and a merchant of Habana.

F. B. Thurber, of New York, and president of the United States Export Association. From his testimony he appears to be much more interested in exportations to Cuba than in anything else.

Hugh Kelly, of New York, sugar merchant and planter of the West Indies, and incidentally connected with two sugar estates in Cuba, one of which is the Santa Teresa Sugar Company, owning 9,000 acres of sugar land.

William R. Corwine, representing the Merchants' Association of New York. He expressly stated, in his testimony, that the consent of his association to the remission of these duties and to the creation of a market here for the sugar of Cuba is conditioned absolutely on the event that we shall have established, permanently and safely, Cuban markets for the sale of our goods. It is easy to see where his interest lies. He cares but little for Cuba, except as it may furnish him a market for his goods. How pleasant it must seem to the farmer to be asked to give up his industry that a market may be furnished to these poor gentlemen of New York, and they probably do business on Wall street, too. [Laughter.]

Miguel G. De Mendoza, Cuban commissioner on economic affairs and sugar planter, owning 27,000 acres of land. He is one of the poor sufferers that our farmers will be delighted to assist.

Evan Thomas, ex-president of the New York Produce Exchange, and stated that his association looks at this largely from the standpoint of export business with Cuba.

Charles P. Armstrong, of the New York Produce Exchange, and he states that the interest of the exchange, "of course, is the interests of American products to the island of Cuba." Not much philanthropy there; not much interest in Cuba, except as it may benefit the New York exchange.

Hon. R. B. Hawley, of Texas, representing American sugar interests. Interested in about 75,000 acres of land purchased the last three years.

Charles Rabadan, of the New York Produce Exchange.

James H. Post, of New York, president National Sugar Refining Company and other companies.

Is there anyone in this list who assumes to speak for the masses of Cuba, for the laborers, and the small planters and farmers? Not one. Is there one that deserves help? Not one.

Now, let us take up the proposition, Is there distress in Cuba to-day? What do these men say? Listen:

Mr. Adkins:

Q. You have been engaged in the sugar business about twenty years?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. I ask you whether or not it has been a profitable business to you?
A. It has in the past.
Q. Was it profitable last year?
A. It was profitable last year.

Mr. Mendoza:

Q. Well, has the sugar business in Cuba been profitable?
A. It has.
Q. Well, did you make money last year?
A. I made very little. I made about 3 per cent on the capital employed.

How much capital do you suppose he had employed with a 27,000-acre sugar plantation? From estimates given, about $13,500,000. Three per cent profit on that would be only about $405,000. Poor man, how he must have suffered! Most of our farmers would think they were doing pretty well if they made that much profit in a lifetime. [Laughter and applause.]

Colonel Bliss, collector at Habana:

Q. Is there any distress at the present time in the island of Cuba?
A. Any distress? No, sir.
Q. The people are all employed?
A. Yes, sir. I should say that there was no distress whatever, from all I have seen.
Q. You have said that labor there is employed all over the island. In what does this distress of which you speak consist?
A. I have not spoken of any distress, except to deny that any existed so far as I knew. It is a long time since I have seen anyone begging on the streets, or anybody who wanted to work who was not at work at good wages.

It has been my observation as well as experience that if labor is employed at good wages the people are generally prosperous and happy. What is the condition in Cuba?

Colonel Bliss:

Q. As I understand it, the labor in Cuba is at present well employed and at good wages?
A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Place:

Q. You are familiar with the industrial conditions of the island?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. At the present time, outside of Habana, there is no labor that is idle or unemployed?
A. No, sir; the Central Railroad of Cuba will take anyone who wants to work.

Mr. Mendoza:

Q. Is the class more generally employed on the island outside of Habana?
A. It is. They are all employed. There is plenty of work for the workmen in Cuba to-day.

Mr. Kelly:

Q. I understand you have not enough labor in Cuba to-day to harvest your present crop.
A. That is true.
Q. And you are paying on an average about $23.50 a month for labor?
A. We are paying more in some cases. In our end of the island we are paying an average of $30 a month.
Q. That is simply for field hands?
A. That is for the cheapest form of labor we have.
Q. Does it include lodging?
A. The Cuban laborer does not want much in the way of lodging. He sleeps beside his work most of the time. He travels with a hammock.

Can there be any doubt from the foregoing that labor is prosperous and happy? If it is not, it is its own fault. It appears that the sugar industry has been a profitable one, at least up to the present year, and that labor is well employed. Is there any distress then, and, if so, where is it? It is true that many of the plantations are mortgaged. Some of them were mortgaged before the war, others have been mortgaged since for the purchase of machinery and for the rehabilitation of their works, and many have been purchased by American speculators since the war, and probably mortgaged for part of the purchase money.

The price of sugar is low at the present time the world over, caused by overproduction. If any distress exists it is in the minds of these people for fear that they will not make any money this year. Colonel Bliss says:

There are a great many planters who have gone to the wall, and nothing is going to help them; it will not make any difference what you do.

These men must be left out of consideration so far as this bill is concerned and the relief that it proposes to give. Those who have rehabilitated their farms and those who have gone there and purchased plantations since the war are fearful, however, that they will make no money this year, and that they will be thrown into bankruptcy.

Instead of a present distress it is a threatened distress that is now made the basis for this bill. I will admit that distress or rather bankruptcy may come to these people, or some of them. Then, again, it may not. I don't think Adkins will suffer much. He may lose some money, but I imagine he has some business here in the United States that will tide him over. Mendoza may lose a little money, but if he made about $405,000 last year he ought not to suffer a great deal this year.

Kelly will not likely suffer a great deal. The many Americans who have gone into the island the last year or two and purchased may lose some money and suffer to that extent, but should this Government stand sponsor for profits to these people? Shall the American farmer pay tribute to insure profits to these American speculators who have gone to a foreign country to invest their money? It seems to me to be a monstrous proposition, and should be condemned by every American citizen. [Applause.]

If they make a bad investment they are entitled to no sympathy or assistance from us. It might be well to see what American interests are in Cuba. According to Mr. Adkins, the Trinidad Company, of which he is president, produces about 10,000 tons a year; his own property produces about 12,000 tons; the Homiguiero estate, owned by a New York corporation, produces about 12,000 tons; the Constancia estate, recently purchased by parties from Louisiana, represented by Mr. Spellman, of the Illinois Central Railroad, have a capacity of about 20,000 tons; the United Fruit Company, of Boston, started last year, has a capacity of about 20,000 tons; the property recently purchased by the Chapara Sugar Company, owned by New York gentlemen and ex-Representative Hawley, has a capacity of about 30,000 tons, and the San Francisco estate, owned by Mr. Craig, of Philadelphia, has a capacity of about 15,000 tons.

These are the gentlemen that are coming here now and asking us to relieve them, at the expense of the American farmer, from their error in judgment in investing in Cuban lands and from their error in thinking that sugar would keep a good price. That this House may pass this bill is probably true; that the American people will approve it I do not believe.

Men make bad investments in this country, but they do not ask the Government to help them out. Millions of dollars have been lost in real-estate speculations in our country, but the Government did not come to our relief. A few years ago the farmers of my State were bankrupt. Their farms were mortgaged, foreclosed, and sold. Distress was actual, real, and present. The future was dark and hopeless. Did the Government help them? No. Did they sit down and whine; did they fold their arms and say: "We are bankrupt; we will do nothing?" No. They went to work; they planted other crops. Good times came. They received good prices for their products, and to-day they own their own homes and are happy, contented, and prosperous. So, I say, let these people do likewise. [Applause.]

Instead of coming to the Government and asking for help, let them help themselves. Let them face the future bravely. They should understand that this Government will not guarantee to them good crops, good prices, or prosperity. They will have to take their chances in the world's great battle. In the natural order of things good times will come, and with it success and prosperity. I am glad to say that no wail has come up from the Cuban people themselves. Those who fought the battles for independence through the long and bloody years are not here asking for aid. Those who bore the rifle and swung the machete in behalf of liberty and independence are facing the future with the same grim courage that they faced the Spaniard. All honor to them. [Applause.]

But what must we say of those who have seen in prostrate Cuba only a field for speculation and enrichment? What shall we say of those who during that bloody struggle paid tribute to both sides in order to run their plantations for profit, while the poor man, the laborer, was fighting for the freedom of his country, and now come whining for aid to save them from a temporary loss? This house, this country, should say, "Away! Depart! Care for yourselves!" [Applause.]

"Oh," but they say "we are under obligations to help Cuba." In God's name how, when, or why have we incurred any obligation to help her? They say "we have destroyed her markets." I deny it. She has the same markets she had before. Armstrong says:

Q. And really there is no change in the condition that existed before the Spanish war and to-day?
A. Not as far as the market of sugar is concerned.

Adkins says:

Q. What market do you claim Cuba has lost by reason of the war?
A. We have not lost any market.

They say: "We have prevented her from making commercial treaties with other countries." I deny it. "Oh," they say, "the Platt amendment does this." I deny it. In this respect the Platt amendment simply provides as follows:

I.

That the Government of Cuba shall never enter into any treaty or other compact with any foreign power or powers which will impair or tend to impair the independence of Cuba, nor in any manner authorize or permit any foreign power or powers to obtain by colonization or for military or naval purposes or otherwise, lodgment in or control over any portion of said island.

II.

That said government shall not assume or contract any public debt to pay the interest upon which, and to make reasonable sinking-fund provision for the ultimate discharge of which the ordinary revenues of the island, after defraying the current expenses of government, shall be inadequate.

The third provision allows intervention on our part to preserve the independence of the island and to maintain law and order.

From this it will be seen that the Platt amendment in no way restricts Cuba from making commercial treaties or agreements with other countries. The only restriction is that she shall not enter into any treaty that will impair her independence or allow a foreign nation to secure a lodgment on her soil, and that she shall not incur an obligation that the revenues of the island are inadequate to discharge. It is also provided that we may intervene to preserve the independence of the island. Each and all of these provisions are for the benefit and advantage of Cuba and are nothing more nor less than the written declaration of the Monroe doctrine.

Without this declaration we would never allow a foreign country to again exercise sovereignty over Cuba or secure a foothold upon her soil. Without this amendment, would we allow her independence to be impaired or a foreign power gain a footing on her territory? Surely not. She can still make any trade treaty or commercial agreement that she sees fit. She can discriminate for us or against us as she pleases. She can grant trade concessions to Great Britain or she can withhold them, and we can not say her nay. Any other construction, it seems to me, is farfetched and not made in good faith. I am perfectly willing to leave the meaning of these provisions to the judgment and interpretation of the most unlettered.

Under obligations to Cuba! By no manner of means. Our treatment of her stands alone in the history of nations. What have we done for her and her people? From what have we relieved them? What sacrifices have we made in her behalf? In 1511 the Spaniard Velasquez took possession of the island. The natives were simple, peaceable, and submissive. Haluey alone headed a band in resistance. His followers were defeated; he was taken and burned at the stake. A priest stood by his side and adjured him to accept Christianity that his spirit might be wafted to the realms of eternal bliss. He asked if he would meet any Spaniards there, and on being answered in the affirmative, said, "I will not go to a place where I may meet one of that accursed race."

From that time on there were two peoples. The Cubans, simple, quiet, and peaceable, but with the spirit of their martyr smoldering in their breasts, and the Spaniards, haughty, domineering, and merciless. Cuba was the prey of the Spanish official and politician and the treasury of the Spanish Crown. Her people were ruled with an iron hand. Governors-general had almost absolute power. While liberty grew and flourished in sight of her shores, she was oppressed. The rapacity of Spain robbed her of her wealth.

The proceeds of her labor went to fill the coffers of a horde of Spanish officeholders and the fruits of her industry were plucked by foreign hands. As much as $40,000,000 a year was taken in taxes from her people. From 1823 until February 24, 1895—the beginning of the end—there was an almost continual struggle for freedom and independence. One revolution ended only to be succeeded by another, and another, and another. They all failed. In 1895 another one began. The island was ravaged by the contending forces. The insurgents held their own in the conflicts that occurred, but did not seem to be able to succeed. The forces of Spain seemed too powerful to be overcome, but they were also unable to capture the insurgents. Concentration camps were formed. Starvation and decimation seemed to be the end.

Our people had watched the struggle with horror. Efforts had been made to end the struggle by diplomatic means, but failed. Humanity revolted. Our people could stand it no longer. Not for power, not for conquest, not for glory, but for humanity's sake war was declared with Spain in order that Cuba might be free. Our armies were marshaled and our navies manned in her behalf. Millions of dollars were spent in her behalf. Thousands of our noblest sons faced death in her cause. Thousands of lives and untold suffering were laid upon the altar of her deliverance. The Spanish oppressor and his oppressive laws were swept from the island, and the spirit of Haluey, hovering over his beloved land, saw the flower of the Spanish fleet burning and sinking near his funeral pyre. [Loud applause.]

We did not stop with the end of the war. We spent millions in feeding the starving. We built her roads, cleaned her cities, and made them free of pestilence and as healthy as our own; we organized her schools, and assisted her in the establishment of a stable government. We are now ready to withdraw our forces, take down our flag, and allow her to take her place among the nations of the earth, a free and independent people. And that is not all. We still say to her, and are pledged to the promise, that all the power and all the wealth and all the manhood of this great Republic are at her disposal to protect her against the attack and encroachment of the world. Weak as she is, small as she is, we guarantee her liberty and independence. [Applause.]

Not one cent do we ask in return, and yet we are told by a few exporters of this country, by the agents of the sugar trust, by those Americans who have invested their moneys in Cuban plantations in the hope and expectation of making thousands of dollars out of her poverty and distress, by those Spanish planters and naturalized Cuban-Americans who saved their plantations from destruction by paying tribute to both sides during the insurrection, that the American people owe the Cubans something, that we are under obligations to them, and that we must not only guarantee the Cubans—meaning themselves—prosperity and commercial success, but we must also make good the speculations of these Spanish and American investors. Will we do it? That is the question. It shall not be done with my vote. [Applause.]

It seems to me clear that there is no distress in Cuba to-day and that there is but little probability of any in the near future that would require the passage of this legislation. It also seems clear that there is no obligation on our part to pass this legislation.

Even if there is distress in Cuba or likely to be, and even if we are under obligations to do something for them, this legislation will not help them. I believe I can show this clearly, and I believe that I can show that this legislation, instead of being a benefit to the Cubans, will very largely, if not entirely, go to the credit of the sugar trust and result in great injury to the industries of this country.

This legislation is the product of certain influences at work here. What those influences are I will let the Speaker of this House say. In a letter to one of his constituents some time ago he used this language:

The second question is, What are we going to do for Cuba? It is a separate and distinct proposition, and this is the situation: Those contending for Cuba want a reduction of 50 per cent or a clean sweep of duties between us and that country. Contending for this doctrine is, first, the American trust, which is here in the person of its ablest managers; second, the money—the capital—that has been put into the construction of railroads in Cuba, where a system of railroads extending along what may be termed "the backbone of the island," with arms extending from the backbone into each part of it, is in process of construction.

All the money in this enterprise is anxious, of course, to build up the commerce of Cuba. Third, there are millions of dollars that have gone into Cuba, buying up plantations, cheap lands, and with large syndicates formed are seeking to make fortunes out of the sugar industry. Then, again, there are Americans over there with vast sums of money in various enterprises who are all anxious for this. Then, again, the Cubans themselves who have the capital are anxious to have free-trade relations with the United States.

These all touch elbows and are working together. * * * The contention is brought to us from our own people that we have shed blood and money enough for Cuba, now an independent government, so to speak, without slaughtering the farmer interests of our own country, and the most intense feeling exists. * * * I beg of a man of your intelligence and experience not to accept the flying reports and dispatches sent out and stimulated by the concrete organization, as I have indicated, who, indifferent to our own farming interests in this country, want to break down all the barriers between us and Cuba.

This language is significant and true, and I ask the country to consider is most carefully before condemning those who oppose this bill. I believe there is enough stated in that letter alone to condemn this measure and relegate it to oblivion.

Now as to the bill itself. It is a useless measure, a makeshift, and will bring no relief to the Cubans at all. The demand has been for free trade with Cuba, or at the very least a reduction of 50 per cent. Those pretending to speak on behalf of Cuba assert most positively that a 20 per cent reduction will not furnish relief. All the testimony taken upon this point sustains this contention, and after the decision was announced to make a 20 per cent reduction, General Palma, the newly elected president of the Cuban Republic, stated in a public interview:

It will be very disappointing to the Cuban people. I do not wish to criticise the action of Congress, but that is the only reply I can make to your question. We asked for a reduction that would be sufficient not only to permit the sugar planters to meet the actual expenses of operating the mills, but to give them some profit, some benefit. We have said from the beginning that a reduction of 50 per cent, or possibly 40 per cent, was necessary for Cuba's relief, and I have said before, as I am compelled to say now, that 20 per cent reduction will not be of any benefit. As for the proposal to limit the reduction to December of next year, I can only comment on it by saying that the whole resolution appears to be not satisfactory.

It can be of no benefit on this year's crop, and will only result in surely placing in the profits of the sugar trust over $5,000,000 for this year's output alone. It has been contended that relief is needed to enable the harvesting of this year's crop. Harvesting will be completed by the 1st of May and at any rate by the 15th of May. This bill can not be passed by that time, and it will be long after that time before the Cuban government can comply with the conditions of this act. The crop will all be harvested and in the hands of the agents of the sugar trust.

This will be true, because the planters are not able to hold their crops. If they are, then the plea for relief falls to the ground. If they are able to hold the crop, they do not need relief. If they have not held their crop, then they get no relief. The sugar trust can hold until the bill is passed, import the sugar, and put the reduction in the duty in their pocket. I have no doubt but that Mr. Adkins, Mr. Kelly, Mr. Hawley, Mr. Mendoza, and these other great sugar barons can hold their sugar, and they will probably ship themselves and likely get the benefit; but, as I said before, if they can hold, they do not need relief.

Furthermore, if matters are in a bad shape this bill will make them worse instead of better. The cause of the low price of sugar is overproduction. The supply is about 1,500,000 tons above the demand. This amount of sugar is looking and wishing for a market. There is only a certain demand for it. If the Cuban begins to supply this demand by reason of a reduction of the tariff, it is not difficult to see what the result will be. Those holding this surplus sugar will want to get something out of it. They will throw their sugar on the market and reduce prices in order to sell, and the Cuban will have to meet the cut. Instead of getting more for his sugar he will get less. Mr. Adkins stated in his testimony—

That anything that was done to relieve Cuba in the way of reducing duties would, in my personal opinion, have the effect of at once starting this avalanche of surplus sugars onto the United States market, and that in order to get something for their surplus stock they would further reduce prices.

He further stated—

That would be a temporary condition, which would all be cleared up in the course of a year or two.

If this statement is correct, and it is a reasonable one, then this act would be worse than useless, because it expires by its own limitation before any good effect would become manifest. It would increase the condition that it is intended to alleviate.

The sugar trust—The American Sugar Refining Company—will, in my judgment, be the chief if not the sole beneficiary of this reduction. To realize this we must understand the situation. Most of the sugar used in the United States is refined sugar; practically all of the sugar imported into the United States is raw sugar, sugar that has not gone through the process of refining. When this raw sugar reaches this country it is here refined.

The sugar that comes from Cuba is raw sugar and is sold to the sugar refineries. The sugar trust controlling the great percentage of the refineries is practically the only consumer and the only purchaser of raw sugar in the United States because it controls at least 80 and probably 90 per cent of the entire output of the refined sugar and has a capacity sufficient to turn out the entire output and supply the whole demand. Upon this point Mr. Havemeyer, in his testimony before the Industrial Commission, said:

OUTPUT OF THE AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING COMPANY.

Q. May we take up for a moment the question of prices of which you have spoken? You have given here quotations on raw and refined sugar for twenty years and also the world's output for five years. Have you put in your tables the output of the American Sugar Refining Company?

A. No.

Q. About how much is that?

A. About 30,000 barrels a day.

Q. What proportion does that form of the total output of the country now?

A. I have never been able to get at those figures, but I should say about 90 per cent.

Q. You think about 90 per cent of America?

A. That is not of the capacity, but of the output. The fact is that these refineries are not working full.

Q. Does the American Sugar Refining Company itself have a capacity enough to supply the total demand if it were not for the opposition? Your company could easily supply the total demand at the present capacity?

A. The demand and 20 per cent in excess.

From this you can see the interest the sugar-refining company has in the reduction of the duties upon raw sugar, and well was the Speaker of the House justified in saying:

Contending for this doctrine is, first, the American sugar trust which is here in the person of its ablest manager.

This trust is not pushing this matter from philanthropic motives; it cares nothing for suffering Cuba. It knows no philanthropy; it knows no ethics; it cares only for business and profit. Let Mr. Havemeyer speak, as he did before the Industrial Commission:

Q. Well, say it was $50,000,000; even it up. That leaves $25,000,000, which seem to stand for good-will, brands, etc. Do you think it fair that the consumer should pay a dividend to your company on these brands, good-will, etc?

Now, notice the answer to this question.

A. I think it fair to get out of the consumer all you can, consistent with the business proposition.

Q. You state that as an ethical position before the Commission, and you have to stand on that ethical position for fair play. Now, I want to know if you think—you stated that the consumer received the benefits of this consolidation of industry—it is a fair ethical proposition, independent of the business view you put on it, that the consumer should pay dividends on this $25,000,000 of overcapitalization?

A. I do not care two cents for your ethics; I do not know enough of them to apply them.

Do you think that a corporation controlled by a man impelled by such motives cares anything for the suffering in Cuba? Do you think that his company has its ablest manager here only to help out the planters of Cuba? I can not accept this view of the situation. I believe that they are here to get everything they possibly can that will result in benefit to them and increased profits to their stock.

Many of our people think that by this reduction they will get their sugar cheaper. This idea is a pretty general one, and it has much to do with the formation of public opinion in favor of this bill. If there is no basis for this statement, then many of our people will not be so strongly in favor of it. I received a letter from one of my constituents the other day, and this is what he says:

Get that duty off sugar just as soon as you can.

Why does he say this? What does he think will be the result? Listen:

We need cheap sugar to use along with our fruit here.

This is one of the reasons why he favors this bill. He thinks he will get his sugar cheaper. Would he? Certainly not. The bill itself is framed upon the theory that it will not reduce the price of sugar to the people of this country, because if the price of sugar is reduced there would be no benefit to the Cubans, and this is a bill to help the Cubans, and not our own people. It has been assumed by every man who has spoken on this floor that the consumer will get no benefit from this reduction. It so appeared from the testimony before the committee.

Mr. ARMSTRONG said:

Q. You say the price of raw sugar is fixed at Hamburg. If that is so and we remove the duty on raw sugar coming from Cuba, will the price of raw sugar still be fixed at Hamburg?

A. Always.

Q. Then the benefit of the removal, of course, will not be enjoyed by the consumer of sugar in the United States?

A. No, sir.

Q. What effect would it [the removal of the duty] have upon the American consumer?

A. None whatever.

Mr. MENDOZA:

Q. I know that; but even free trade with Cuba, I understand from the testimony we have gotten on this subject in this hearing, would not affect the price at all in the world?

A. No; it would not to-day, because there is an overproduction.

The honorable chairman in his report frankly states:

All the experts who were called before the committee admit that the price of sugar will not be less to the consumer on account of the 20 per cent reduction proposed.

If there be no reduction to the consumer and no more than 30 per cent goes to the planter, what will become of the other 70 per cent? It will go to the trust, of course, and swell its profits or be used by it in crushing out the beet-sugar industry. If it gets this additional profit it can well afford to lose it all by cutting prices so as to crush out the beet industry, and then it will raise the prices to suit itself and have the consumer at its mercy. This has been the policy of the trust heretofore and it will be its policy again.

My friend also gives another reason why he is in favor of this bill. Notice what it is:

We do not want, in my judgment, to foster in any possible way a single trust in the United States, but bat them between the eyes whenever you get the chance.

He thinks this bill will hurt the trusts, and therefore he is in favor of it. I am satisfied that it will help the trusts, and therefore I am opposed to it. My friend does not know fully the influences that work in favor of this bill.

If he did he would be opposed to it, and if I, knowing of these influences, should support this bill, then he would condemn me when he should learn of the existence of such influences. If there be no reduction in price to the consumer in this country, and if, as Colonel Bliss said, no more than 30 per cent of the reduction would go to the Cuban planter, what would become of the other 70 per cent? It will go to the trust, of course, and swell its profits or be used by it in crushing out the beet-sugar industry of this country.

The friends of the measure say, "If the price to the consumer is not reduced, how will this bill hurt the beet-sugar industry?" I will tell you how. If the price to the consumer is not reduced there may be no direct injury, but the mere fact of this agitation will prevent the building up of the industry; will prevent its development; will prevent the building and erection of new factories, because capital will not go into this enterprise with the prospect of having to meet a much further reduction upon the demand of the Cuban people in the future.

The great danger from this bill is that it will put into the hands of the sugar trust a fund with which to break down the present beet-sugar interest. [Applause.] It will put into the hands of the trust a club to destroy the only competitor they have in this country. The sugar trust could well afford to take five or six millions of the money that would go into its coffers, by reason of the passage of this bill, and go into the Western beet-sugar field and reduce the price of sugar, as it has done heretofore.

If it should do this, of course there would be a reduction to the consumer. This, however, would be only temporary, and when the beet-sugar interests were crushed out then the price would go up even higher than before, and, as shown by the testimony of Mr. Havemeyer, the consumers would have to pay for the reduction in the end. The consumers of sugar in this country do not want a reduction in the price of sugar temporarily if it results in the destruction and throttling of a most promising home industry. [Applause.]

I desire to call your attention to some more of the testimony of Mr. Havemeyer before the Industrial Commission that indicates the policy of the sugar refining company with reference to competition and with reference to evening matters up with consumers.

Referring to some sugar refineries that had started in opposition to the sugar trust, and who were termed "interlopers," the following testimony was given:

METHOD OF THE COMPETITION.

Q. I inferred from your expression a moment or two ago, "These 'interlopers' came in," that it was perhaps a part of your policy to see to it that they did not stay in the business too long; something in the same way that you dealt with the Spreckles opposition in Philadelphia?

A. It was a part of our policy and principles. We did not think they could have any advantage in profit over us, and we let them take the results, whatever they may be.

Q. Your policy was, substantially, to put the price down so that they would not find it profitable to remain in the business?

A. And to secure the continuation of the output of the American Sugar Refinery, which is very vital to it.

Q. If the opposition refiners were to remain in business they would lessen the percentage to your stockholders, you say?

A. If they remained in the business and sold the product—two different things again. Every sale by them displaces so much of the American Company's product, and this is what we have to look out for—that they do not.

Q. If you can make it unprofitable to them they will stop their sales, and in the long run the expectation is that the profits will be larger to your stockholders?

A. That would be the natural inference. Of course, it goes without saying if we protect our own meltings it can only be done under a condition of things that makes it unprofitable for our competitors, the real motive being the protection of our own business, and the result being an absence of profit to them.

Mr. Havemeyer considers this matter from a purely business standpoint, and if by using a part of this tariff reduction on raw sugar that goes to his benefit he could crush out his competitors in refined sugar, he would do it. In his testimony he says:

We maintain that when we reduced the cost we were entitled to the profit, and that it was none of the public's business. We took it and paid it out to our stockholders. It may be business policy to share that with the public sometimes. We did not do that then. We have done it since. We had to increase the output. We could injure our competition by reducing our margin. This is business policy again, not philanthropy.

If Mr. Havemeyer could injure his competitors by using a part of this gift which we propose to make to him, he would consider it a business policy to do so and not philanthropy. Again he says:

EFFECT OF COMPETITION ON THE CONSUMER.

Q. Is it for the benefit of the consumer that prices are temporarily put down when competition enters the field until you can crush out that competitor, as I gather from your testimony? Is it for the advantage of the consumer if, when that competition is crushed out, you put up the prices immediately thereafter to such a margin of profit as will cover all these expenses and others—that is, the expenses of the fight, the wear and tear, the buying out refineries, and all that? I would ask you if that is for the benefit of the consumer?

A. Well, I do not know. You would have to find out what the figures were in order to determine whether it was just or not. I think the consumer would have to be subject to such a condition of things if it was a trade condition.

Q. I ask this because you have in your testimony laid such stress upon the interests of the consumer.

A. Do you think by lowering the prices merely to crush out the competitor, as you put it, that the consumer is not benefited?

Q. I say he may be benefited temporarily for six months or a year, but if after the crushing out has taken place you then, as you said in your testimony, resume a margin of profit which you consider is the right thing, and that is the only thing you are governed by, I ask you, then, whether the consumer will be materially benefited or not?

A. Is he not benefited to the extent of the reduction of prices during the fight?

Q. He is; but if he has to pay double or three times the price after the fight is ended, I fail to see where he is benefited.

A. He is not, if he has to pay that.

Q. I understood you to say when the war was ended you evened up?

A. Yes.

Q. The price you put on was for the benefit of the stockholders?

A. Yes.

OBJECTS OF THE AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING COMPANY.

Q. (By Senator MALLORY.) Did I understand you to say—perhaps I may have misunderstood you a while ago—that it was your policy to make as much profit out of the consumer as you possibly could?

A. Consistent with business methods.

Q. Consistent with business principles. In other words, your idea is that your organization, the American Sugar Refining Company, will, if it can, get the maximum profit out of its business from the consumer. Now, I also understand you to imply at least that it is the policy of the American Sugar Refining Company to crush out all competition, if possible.

A. But that is not so; there is no such testimony. I understand it has been put in that form by one of the gentlemen here; but it is not the fact. What I said was that it was the policy of the American Company to maintain and to protect its trade, and if it resulted in crushing a competitor it is no concern of the American Company; if he gets in the press, that is his affair, not ours.

Q. And if anyone interferes with the business, profits, or competition of the American Sugar-Refining Company it is its policy to prevent it if possible?

A. By lowering profits to defy it.

Q. And if it results in crushing him out——

A. (Interrupting.) That is his affair.

Q. Not the affair of the American Sugar Refining Company?

A. No.

Q. Now, suppose in the natural course of events the American Sugar Refining Company should suppress—we will not use the word crush out—all competition, all opposition? I understand from your theory—business principles—that you would then seek to get out of the public and consumer the largest amount of profit consistent with your idea of business principles?

A. Precisely.

In the name of God, will the American people place in the hands of the trust the power to crush out the only regulator and the only means by which the price of sugar is reduced in this country? What is the trust doing in my country now? Listen! I have here a telegram from Spokane, dated March 2, from the president of the only sugar-beet factory in our State. He says:

Western Sugar Refinery—San Francisco branch of the sugar trust—has notified jobbers here that they must discontinue handling or selling our sugar, under penalty of the trust's displeasure.

A plain attempt to crush out the industry.

But I see by the papers that out in Spokane there is some of the spirit of the fathers of 1800 manifested by the laboring men of that town. What did they do? They gathered together in their council and resolved that they would consume no sugar except that of our beet-sugar factory. [Applause.] My vote shall not become the ally of the trust to throttle this industry of the farmers of my State. [Applause.]

The consumers of sugar should not look lightly upon the beet-sugar industry. It has been the great factor in the reduction of the price of sugar, and if we want cheaper sugar in this country we must depend upon the beet for it. It is far more worthy of trust in this regard than the sugar trust. In 1871–72, when more cane sugar was produced in the world than beet sugar, the price was 5.37 cents per pound. The following table shows the production of cane and beet sugar up to the year 1900, and the price for each year:

The world's production of beet and cane sugar and average price per pound from 1871 to 1900.

Year.	Beet.	Cane.	Total.	Price.
	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Cents.
1871–72	1,020,000	1,599,000	2,619,000	5.37
1872–73	1,210,000	1,793,000	3,003,000	5.35
1873–74	1,288,000	1,840,000	3,128,000	4.95

1877–78	1,419,000	1,825,000	3,244,000	5.06
1878–79	1,571,000	2,010,000	3,581,000	4.16
1879–80	1,402,000	1,852,000	3,244,000	4.18
1880–81	1,748,000	1,911,000	3,659,000	4.41
1881–82	1,782,000	2,060,000	3,842,000	4.41
1882–83	2,147,000	2,107,000	4,254,000	4.37
1883–84	2,361,000	2,323,000	4,684,000	3.61
1884–85	2,545,000	2,351,000	4,896,000	2.67
1885–86	2,223,000	2,339,000	4,562,000	2.84
1886–87	2,733,000	2,345,000	5,078,000	2.50
1887–88	2,451,000	2,465,000	4,916,000	2.75
1888–89	2,725,000	2,263,000	4,988,000	3.21
1889–90	3,633,000	2,069,000	5,702,000	3.28
1890–91	3,710,000	2,555,000	6,265,000	3.03
1891–92	3,501,000	2,852,000	6,353,000	2.93
1892–93	3,428,000	3,045,000	8,473,000	3.09
1893–94	3,890,000	3,490,000	7,380,000	2.92
1894–95	4,792,000	3,530,000	8,322,000	2.15
1895–96	4,315,000	2,830,000	7,155,000	2.29
1896–97	4,954,000	2,864,000	8,818,000	2.01
1897–98	4,872,000	2,898,000	7,770,000	2.55
1898–99	4,977,000	2,995,000	7,973,000	2.39
1899–1900	5,510,000	2,904,000	8,414,000	2.49

From this it appears that cane-sugar production increased only a little over 100 per cent, while beet sugar increased over 400 per cent, and the price is less than one-half of what it was in 1871 and 1872. The beet-sugar industry in this country is the only regulator and competitor of the sugar trust. The following testimony settles this proposition clearly and surely:

Q. Did the beet-sugar industry in this country cut any figure in that decline [decline of margin between refined and raw] in your judgment?

A. It did, undoubtedly. Every producer that you have cuts a figure in reducing prices.

Q. You stated a little while ago that the beet-sugar industry controlled the market.

A. It does; it makes the price. .

Mr. ARMSTRONG, page 78:

The CHAIRMAN. That would depend on the supply and demand. If the supply was short, it would have that tendency, undoubtedly?

A. It would. It was different from to-day, with only one or two buyers. Something over a year or two years ago there were one or two independent refineries built, and war broke out between the sugar trust and the independent refineries, and the trust broke down rates to a very low point for the sake of knocking out those one or two refineries, and when that was accomplished prices advanced again, and when you take the average of all that time you get the fifty-one one-hundredths.

The CHAIRMAN. They have knocked out the independent factories the last two or three years?

A. Yes, sir; they bought them out.

Q. They all operate together now, so the only regulator of refined sugar is the beet-sugar interests?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are they (the sugar refineries) the only purchasers of sugar in the United States?

A. Yes, sir; there is no other market for it whatever.

Q. There would be no competition whatever as to the matter of fixing the price in the United States with the sugar refineries of the United States, would there? There is no other source from which competition could come?

A. None I know of.

We should hesitate long before we take any step that will even threaten this industry that means so much to us and to our farmers.

As I said before, Cuba furnishes to this country only the raw sugar. They do not refine it there. It is all refined in this country. As Mr. Havemeyer says, the American Refining Company refines about 90 per cent and has capacity for the entire output. It is therefore about the only consumer and purchaser of raw sugar. Mr. Armstrong in his testimony says:

Q. Are they (the sugar refiners) the only purchasers of sugar in the United States?

A. Yes, sir; there is no other market for it whatever.

Q. There would be no competition whatever as to the matter of fixing the price in the United States with the sugar refineries of the United States, would there? There is no other source from which competition could come?

A. None I know of.

If there is no competition, then the trust can fix its own price. "Oh," but they say, "if we reduce the duty on raw sugar the trust will pay the planter the market price and he, the planter, will therefore get the benefit of the reduction." You forget, overlook, or suppress the fact that the sugar trust buys the sugar in Cuba very largely, if not entirely.

But what difference does that make? All the difference in the world. It pays there the world price of sugar—the Hamburg price. No consideration is taken of the duty. The trust then imports the sugar—mark that—not the planter; and when it brings it to New York or any point in the United States it pays the duty. It gets the benefit of the reduction. It pays just that much less duty. Mr. McClellan in his minority report says:

The present trade custom is that Cuban planters sell their product f. o. b. at Habana to the agents of the refineries.

If that is true, and true it is, the refineries get the benefit of the reduction when they reach New York. It is true, he says, that there is no reason why it should not be sold at New York. There may not be any reason why these planters, with 20,000 and 25,000 acres of sugar, should not ship to New York, but the small planter can not do so any more than the small producer of wheat or corn ships direct to Chicago or St. Paul. He sells to the agent or the commission man at the first point of shipment. Mr. Armstrong says, page 84:

The sugar refiner goes to Cuba to buy sugar, and he buys at the market price of that day.

You say he knows that there is a reduction, and therefore he will say to the agent, "You must pay me that much more."

He may say that, but he can not carry it out. He must sell. The trust does not have to buy unless it wants to do so. If, as you say, the planters of Cuba are helpless, their very distress will make them the prey of the trusts and render this legislation nugatory. We know how it is during hard times in this country. The producer can not hold his crop. He must sell. The small wheat raiser, the small corn raiser, does not ship direct to the main market. He sells to the local agent, and the harder the times the worse off he is, the sooner he sells. This is our own experience, and it must be true of the Cuban planter.

One of the best indicators as to the benefit that the trust would derive from this bill is the way in which they view it themselves. The Republicans held several conferences relative to this bill. The first of these conferences indicated that no reduction would be made, and the trust stock was low. As the conferences progressed and the chances in favor of a reduction became better, the price of the stock became better. When the conference decided to make the reduction there was a decided jump in the stock.

In about one week's time it rose about seven points, increasing the value of the $90,000,000 of stock by the snug sum of over $6,000,000. Upon reports as to the attitude of the Senate the stock dropped a point or two. In the reports of April 1 this significant statement was made:

All of these, referring to different stocks, were depressed after the opening, but recovered sharply, sugar rising a point above last week on account of the report from the Committee on Ways and Means on the Cuban reciprocity bill.

Yesterday we voted to close debate on this bill and this morning's stock reports stated:

Sugar became strong for a time on the decision to limit the period for debate on the Cuban reciprocity bill, and its stock went from 131¼ to 133.

In a letter of advice sent out by certain stockbrokers in New York to their patrons this statement is made:

If the reduction becomes a law, the primary beneficiary would be the American Sugar Company, inasmuch as they would be in possession of the raw sugar instead of the planter.

With all due respect to the gentleman from New York, I believe these people know better what the result would be than he does.

Colonel Bliss in his testimony says:

It appears to me that the question relates to the price that the Cuban producer would get, and I do not know what proportion of the increase (from the reduction) would go to him. I believe not more than 30 per cent.

Mr. Adkins also says:

Cuba expects to profit by the action taken in her favor, but she would not profit to the full extent.

Where would the balance go? To whom would the other part of the profit go? To the sugar trust, as sure as fate. No wonder they are anxious. No wonder their best managers are here. No wonder they are flooding the country pleading for help for poor Cuba.

They can afford to pay out a couple of million dollars to get the newspapers to take up this matter, to stir up the people in behalf of Cuba. With what glee do they stand behind the wall of public opinion that they have erected and laugh as they count the millions that they have buncoed from the people of this country. The people may be fooled part of the time, but they will not stay fooled on this question, and then woe to those who accede to their mistaken demands.

The very weakness of the position of those who favor this bill is shown in the bill itself. They have abandoned the simple duty-reduction idea, and, thinking that they have sounded the real sentiment and wishes of the American people, they present a bargain and sale deed for ratification. This bill, instead of being a tariff-reduction bill, is "a bill to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba." Do you think you can fool the American people in this way? Do you think that their love for the almighty dollar has so deadened their sense of justice and right that they will barter upon the sufferings of Cuba to enrich themselves? Beware of the wrath of an outraged people when they understand the bargain you are trying to make in their name.

You provide for a 20 per cent reduction on the products of Cuba coming into this country, and in consideration therefor you require that the government of Cuba shall give us a like reduction upon our products going to their country. This you say is reciprocity. I deny it. What is reciprocity, Republican reciprocity? Is this the reciprocity of Blaine, of McKinley, of the Republican party? No. Blaine's reciprocity was the result of an arrangement between this country and another one by which we could sell such country articles that she did not produce at reduced duties in exchange for a reduction of duties upon articles sold by her to us that we could not produce.

McKinley reciprocity was defined in that memorable speech that crowned his life's work in this language:

We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor.

And the Republican platform defined reciprocity to be:

RECIPROCITY, 1900.

We favor the associated policy of reciprocity, so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce in return for free foreign markets.

This is the true doctrine. We do not want to import articles that we can produce in sufficient quantities to supply the home market. We should not ask a weak country like Cuba to buy from us what she can produce for herself. It has been the policy of this Government from its foundation, it was the policy of the founders of our Government, to encourage the production in our own country of those things that we need and that we can produce. They realized that every dollar sent abroad for articles that we can produce at home takes away that much money from our own people, takes away that much market from our own people, and takes away that much labor from the American workman.

Every time we buy an article made abroad we employ foreign labor just to that extent. Reciprocity supplements this doctrine, and says: "If there is an article that we need, but can not produce, we will reduce the tariff on such an article if the other country will reciprocate." This bill proposes to reduce the tariff on articles that we do and can produce in consideration of a similar reduction on articles exported by us. What is this bill? It is simply a barter of the agricultural interests of this country for the benefit of the manufacturing interests. This is plain language, but it is the truth, and I propose to show it.

Cuba's products are agricultural, so that whatever reduction we make on the tariff is a reduction on agricultural products, and whatever damage comes by reason of that reduction must fall upon agriculture. Whatever benefit will accrue by reason of the reduction of duties by Cuba will go largely to the manufacturing industries. Why? Because Cuba can produce her own agricultural products, but not her manufactured articles. The great plea for this reciprocal trade is made on behalf of the implement, machine, cotton, and other manufactured articles. It is true that the farmers are told that their market will be increased; that if there is a reduction there will be more flour sold there, when the fact is now we furnish them all their flour.

Almost all other agricultural products that they must import are imported from this country. But their witnesses tell us you can get the market of Cuba in manufactured articles, and even though it may injure some one of your industries, this will be more than balanced by greater benefits. I want to say, gentlemen, that it is not right, it is not just, it is not fair, that any injury should be done to any industry in this county that another industry may be benefited. [Loud applause.] Many of the witnesses, exporters, put their whole interests in this relief for Cuba upon the benefit to them as exporters.

Mr. WILLIAM R. CORWIN:

Q. The consent of your association to the remission of these duties and to creating a market here for Cuban sugars is conditioned on the event that we shall have established, permanently and safely, Cuban markets for the sale of our goods?

A. Absolutely; yes.

Mr. EVAN THOMAS, on behalf of New York Produce Exchange:

Q. (By the CHAIRMAN.) Your association looks at this largely from the standpoint of export business with Cuba?

A. Yes, sir.

I deny that we do not have these markets because of the duty. It is the fault of the exporters—of our manufacturers themselves. Let their own witnesses speak as to this matter:

Mr. RABADAN. Geographically the United States is the natural market from which those people should order. There are some conditions by which to-day, for instance, we are handicapped. For instance, Birmingham and Manchester produce and manufacture cotton fabrics adapted to the wants of these people which are different from the goods used here.

And, furthermore, they have been accustomed on account of the very low rate of interest on money in England to sell those goods and give those people long credit. The time will come, sir, if Cuba reaches where all her friends hope she will, when Cuba will be supplied almost directly from the cotton field, and it will be when the present industry alongside the cotton field is more developed, and when we will ship American cotton fabrics from the Gulf ports, which are within a few days' sail of Cuba.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, do you believe if we had free trade in Cuban goods the United States would get a large share of that trade?

Mr. PLACÉ. In two years you will have it. Not at once, because in Europe they are accustomed to do the business as we want it, and they are not accustomed in the United States yet, because they have not got the market. Perhaps if they get the market to suit them they would do it.

Colonel BLISS. Only in the way that Germany and England and France and Spain are all represented by commercial travelers pushing their merchandise and taking orders that I am told the manufacturers in the United States will refuse to take. For instance, you know the duty on such articles as cotton goods (which constitute a very important item of importation into Cuba) depends on the relative weight of a given quantity and measurement of cloth and the number of threads.

If the weight varies a small fraction, or if the threads vary a small fraction, merchandise which has been imported by the importer, believing that it would pay a duty under, we will say, paragraph 114–C, pays a duty under paragraph 114–D, at perhaps an increase of one-third, and he refuses to take it. But that importer can go to any mill, as I am told by them, in England or in France or in Germany or Spain and ask them, "Will you take an order for 50,000 or 100,000 meters of this cloth and guarantee to me that when it reaches the Habana custom-house it will come within a fraction of a gram of weighing so much to a hundred meters and will have exactly so many threads? Otherwise I will refuse to accept it." They will take that order, but I am told that no mill owner in the United States will do it.

I think that fact, together with the system of credits, largely accounts for the fact that trade with Cuba is so largely in European countries. They will sell on nine months' credit, while I am told that the United States shipper will give only thirty days. Therefore the importer sells on six months' credit to his own countrymen, and they in turn sell on three months' credit, and every man has his money in and a large profit (for you can be sure they charge large interest on the capital which is tied up in that way) before he pays the one from whom he has bought.

Our manufacturers do not need any help. It is their own fault that they do not secure this trade. If they would manufacture the cotton goods to suit the trade, they would get it. If they would give as favorable terms and credit as others, they would get it. We are sending cotton goods all over the world. We are nearer to Cuba than any other country. Expense of getting it there is less for us than any others. Why do we not get the trade? The above answers. It is an outrage that the prosperity of one great industry should be threatened under such a flimsy plea. Do you think our farmers will relish this very well when they understand it? By no manner of means. You can offer no justification, either. If our manufacturers can not get the trade of Cuba, working on the same plane as other nations or manufacturers, they do not deserve to have it. [Applause.]

We had reciprocity with Cuba once and how did it work? Very peculiarly, to say the least. The following table shows the trade of this country with Cuba for the last ten years:

Trade of United States with Cuba, 1890 to 1901.

Year.	Exports.	Imports.
1890	$12,669,509	$53,801,591
1891	11,929,605	61,714,395
1892	17,622,411	77,931,671
1893	23,604,094	78,706,506
1894	19,855,237	75,678,261
1895	12,533,260	52,871,259
1896	7,312,348	40,017,730
1897	7,599,757	18,406,815
1898	9,233,894	15,232,477
1899	17,247,952	25,408,828
1900	25,236,808	31,371,704
1901	24,100,453	43,423,088

From this it will be seen that the export trade of Cuba to the United States is rapidly increasing. From 1898 to 1899 the increase was over $10,000,000; from 1899 to 1900, about $6,000,000, and from 1900 to 1901, over $12,000,000. It is also significant that during each of the years 1900 and 1901 we exported to Cuba more than ever before in any one year, even exceeding the much boasted reciprocity year, 1893. This should be considered when talking of the great advantages of reciprocity. Cuban duties are very low now, and a 20 per cent reduction would amount to but little.

From 1891 to 1894–95 we had this wonderful reciprocity that they talk so much about and under which we are going to get this wonderful trade of Cuba. Our exports to Cuba from 1891 until 1893 increased about $12,000,000, while our imports from Cuba increased about $17,000,000. In 1900, without reciprocity, our exports to Cuba were nearly $2,000,000 more than for the highest year during reciprocity. Is that the kind of reciprocity you want? From 1891 to 1892 the exports increased nearly $6,000,000 and the imports increased $16,000,000. At that ratio of reciprocity it would not take long to buy everything they have and sell them nothing.

It will be seen from the foregoing table that our trade with Cuba is increasing very rapidly indeed, both imports and exports. Our exports to Cuba are greater than ever before, and far greater in proportion than at any other time. These things should be considered when talking of the great benefits of reciprocity; but, as I said, they try to make the farmer think this will benefit him. What are the conditions of the farmers' trade with Cuba to-day?

(Mr. Placé, of Habana: Would like to give United States trade and free trade with Cuba.)

The CHAIRMAN. What reduction of duty would secure that trade to the United States?

A. First of all, our present tariff in Cuba to-day is very low. In order to give the American the trade of Cuba we ought to raise the present tariff 50, 60, and 70 per cent, and out of that tariff allow the United States 40, 50, and 60, if you are not willing to allow the United States free trade.

Q. On the food products—pork, lard, and products of that kind—what is the duty now?

A. To-day the duty is very low.

The CHAIRMAN. What proportion of those articles do we furnish?

A. You supply the whole thing.

Q. How about flour?

A. You supply the whole thing.

They appeal to the farmer and say that under reciprocity he would find a market for his products. This is a delusion and a snare. We have the market now.

This legislation presents itself with peculiar force to the farmers of my State. A few years ago in the eastern part wheat was the main crop, as it is to-day. They raised but little else. In 1893 much of the wheat was damaged by the rains and prices were also very low. They had a large crop and no market. This state of affairs continued until 1896. They were in a most deplorable condition. Their farms and homes were mortgaged. These were foreclosed and their homes sold for a song. The savings of a lifetime were consumed in the battle of life, and poverty stalked across the threshold. Distress and suffering were widespread and actually existent.

Did the Government think of helping them? No; they must depend upon themselves. The only hope held out to them was "free silver" by the Democrats and protection by the Republicans. They voted for free silver and got protection. Markets came. Good prices came. Poverty and distress disappeared like dew before the rising sun. Prosperity and happiness came. Foreclosed farms were redeemed, and to-day all are prosperous and happy. Many saw the folly of relying on one crop. They found their soil adopted to sugar-beet culture. The Republican party placed a protective tariff in imported sugar, and promised to protect this industry until it should fully supply the home market. Our farmers relied upon that promise. Many went to raising beets and many more contemplate doing so. Relying upon this promise, a beet-sugar factory with a capacity of 400 tons per day was constructed and put in operation.

Now, upon some possible, alleged, remote, and fancied suffering of some one in a foreign land, in Cuba, their industry is to be interfered with. The Government would not help him in his distress, but it now calls upon him to help those of his own people who have gone with their money to far-off Cuba for investment.

He does not understand this, and he asks: "Why is this; why must I do all this; why do you threaten my industry that you promised to sustain? You have pleaded with me in the past to support protection, and I have done so when it did not protect me directly. This is the one industry, and the only one, where protection is of direct benefit to me. You say protection is to foster, encourage, and promote an infant industry. Ours is certainly one. Why do you in the first year of our substantial growth single us out as the one industry to be affected; why not let the whole nation help if help must be given to Cuba; why not let the trusts, the great corporations, the capitalist, the money lender, the manufacturers, the merchants; why not let all classes bear the burden?"

You may be able to explain your action satisfactorily to your constituents after voting for this bill. I propose to vote as I talked to them. [Applause.] When the Democrats sang to them of free silver, I sang to them of protection. In 1898 I pointed them to the fruits of protection and they sent me here. I propose to so vote that I can say to them this fall: "I kept the faith, I stood by your interests, I stood by my promises." [Applause.]

What is the industry that is threatened by the passage of this bill? What is it now and what is it likely to become if undisturbed? We produced last year about 185,000 tons of beet sugar. In the industry is now invested a capital of about $30,000,000, The amount paid to the farmer for his produce last year was about $7,500,000. The expenditure for coal amounted to about $787,500; the amount for lime rock, $300,000, and operating expenses about $5,000,000, or a grand total of $43,687,500.

While these figures are large, yet they are very small indeed compared with what will be necessary in the production of all the sugar consumed in this country. The amount now consumed is about 2,300,000 tons. Of this the cane sugar of the South furnishes 300,000 tons, Porto Rico 100,000 tons, Hawaii 300,000 tons, and the beet-sugar industry about 150,000 tons, or a total of 850,000 tons, leaving the amount imported and which should be produced at home 1,600,000 tons. To produce this amount will require the erection of about 500 factories of a daily capacity of 500 tons.

The erection and equipment of these factories would require the expenditure of at least $250,000,000, mostly for machinery, lumber, and labor. After the factories are in operation the farmers will be paid about $75,000,000 each year for their beet crop, and a great part of this will be expended for labor and the necessities and comforts of home life.

The producers of coal would be paid about $7,875,000 per annum for coal, much of which would go in wages to the miner. Lime rock will be consumed to the amount of about $3,000,000 worth, much of this also going to labor. Besides this will be the amount employed as working capital during four months of the year, which will amount to about $45,000,000 per annum. What other single farm industry can surpass this industry when fully developed? It certainly is an infant now compared with what it may become with proper encouragement. It is the very cardinal principle of protection that infant industries should be encouraged if there is a possibility of their supplying the home market. That the beet-sugar industry can be so developed has been amply demonstrated. It is now in its infancy, and I for one purpose to stand by the farmer in the only industry wherein protection is of direct benefit to him. [Applause.]

CUBA'S INDUSTRIAL POSSIBILITIES.

There is no reason in this cry for help to Cuba. If there is any danger to Cuba to-day it is from the fact that it is a one-industry country, and, in my judgment, if the failure to pass this legislation should result in the diversification of her industries and products it would be the best thing for her and for us.

Cuba's stability and independence never will stand securely upon a single industry. It is a wonderful country—a land of beautiful sunshine, healthy climate, and a soil of surpassing richness and fertility. Columbus said, "It is the goodliest land eye ever looked upon." It is a land "flowing with milk and honey." Her natural possibilities are not equaled by any country on earth.

By reason of the fertile soil, the equable, moist temperature, and abundant rainfall, it is a veritable garden, abounding in flowers, luscious fruits, and a great variety of vegetables. Thirteen million acres are covered with virgin forests, including some of the most valuable woods, such as mahogany, ebony, walnut, cedar, oak, and Cuban pine, from which most excellent lumber is manufactured. Over much of the cleared portions the grass is abundant, luxuriant, and nutritious, furnishing most excellent pasturage.

Prior to the last war there were about 100,000 farms, orchards, and catttle ranges. In 1891 there were on the island 531,416 horses, 43,309 mules, 2,485,768 cattle, 570,194 pigs, and 78,484 sheep. There is no reason why this country should furnish hogs, cattle, and meat to Cuba. She should do it herself. She can raise cattle most cheaply; hogs will raise themselves. There are millions of palms on the island, and it is estimated that one palm will support and fatten a hog.

There are 8,800,000 acres of land under cultivation, and of this all except about 400,000 acres is cultivated to crops other than sugar and tobacco. The eastern provinces are admirably adapted to the production of coffee of a most excellent quality, and there is no reason why this should not develop into a most prosperous and thriving industry. Oranges, limes, lemons, olives, pineapples, cocoanuts, and other fruits can be grown in profusion and of unsurpassed quality. Vegetables of all kinds grow abundantly, one crop succeeding the other as fast as they mature.

It must also be remembered that many of these products mature when most needed in this country and when not grown here. There is no reason in the world why Cuba may not be the hothouse of this country and always have a market for her produce. The sooner the Cuban people realize that they must depend upon themselves, that they must develop their own resources, and handle their own wealth, the better it will be for them.

According to the testimony of reliable witnesses they are not very much accustomed to depend upon themselves or to work. Mr. Clark, in his Commercial Cuba, says:

The truth, however, must be confessed that the native Cuban lacks both enterprise and capital necessary for the building up of a large export fruit trade, even when he has little to do except to pick the fruit when it is ripe for transportation, and it will not be until American energy has organized this business on wholesale lines, as in the sugar industry, that we can expect to see the natives realizing the sources of wealth, now running wild or rotting on stalks, they have at their doors.

What are the small farmers of Cuba doing? Why do they not develop these various industries? Probably Mr. Adkins explains this. In his testimony he was asked whether or not the countrymen who owned small places of from 30 to 40 acres raised sugar cane. This is his answer:

I am sorry to say the cane they raise is not sugar cane. They live on these little places, and where they have a little place they do not raise much of anything in my experience. They could in our district, for instance, raise corn and potatoes and find a market for them on the spot, but, as a rule, they are not disposed to do that. The small landed proprietor is generally uneducated and has a family around him there and lives the life of a gentleman of ease.

What do our farmers and laboring men think of the proposition for the relief of people who will not help themselves, but who live a life of ease? These people could not starve in this land of plenty if they tried. They could not freeze if they wanted to do so, and if they want to live a life of ease with nothing to do it is not for us to sacrifice a great industry that the one crop, which is now in the hands of the great capitalists, may be prosperous and the great resources with which nature has endowed them be left undeveloped and unused. [Applause.] They must go to work; they must depend upon themselves; they must rely upon their own resources, and the only way to help them is to let them help themselves. As the old saying goes, "Let them root, hog, or die." This is especially applicable when all they need do is "to root." [Applause.]

While denying that we are under any obligations to help Cuba, or that the Cuban people are in distress and need help, yet we are willing to give them assistance in a way that we know will reach them. Instead of remitting six or eight million dollars of our revenues, in a great measure, as we believe, to the sugar trust and sugar barons who do not need nor deserve assistance, we purpose that this money should go into the Treasury of the United States and then be paid directly to the government of Cuba in consideration of any benefits we may receive from reciprocal agreements, similar to those provided in the pending bill. In this way the whole nation will bear the burden, and not a single industry. The capitalist, the corporations, the merchant, the manufacturer, and all classes and business would bear a just part instead of a single industry.

The new government of Cuba will need funds in its treasury when it takes its position among the independent peoples of the world. This is the most crucial period in its life and its history. The most embarrassing situation that confronted this Republic at the beginning of its career was an empty treasury and the lack of means to maintain its national existence; so with Cuba; and the help such as we purpose giving her I believe would be the most efficient means of promoting the stability of her government.

If labor is unemployed and in distress this money could be used in building roads, which are much needed; in building schoolhouses, which should be constructed all over the island; in improving her harbors, and in many other governmental works which no doubt will be necessary to the prosperity of the island. It seems to me that if we desire to help Cuba this is by far the surest and best way to accomplish that end. I am perfectly willing to vote for relief to Cuba in this way, but in no other.

There has been much talk about the free and independent government for Cuba. This bill violates every principle of national independence. It says to Cuba that if you need help we want to help you, but we will not give you any assistance unless you cast at our feet the scepter of national sovereignty and enact our laws regardless of whether they are adapted to your conditions or not.

However much I might like to see the labor laws, the exclusion laws, and the contract-labor laws of this country extended to Cuba, I believe it is an act of tyranny and injustice that has no parallel in the annals of history for one independent country to impose such terms upon another independent country simply by reason of her weakness and her distress. If I were a Cuban, as I am an American, I would scorn the alleged generosity of this bill. [Loud applause.]

In the one hand we hold out to them the apparent generosity of a small tariff reduction, and in the other we hold out the chains of industrial ruin and stagnation. The chains must be fastened and the rivets clinched before they can even touch the apple of Sodom, that will turn to ashes as soon as grasped. I blush for shame that my country should act under the guise of charity and insist that the scepter of Cuba's sovereignty should be the price. [Applause.] This provision alone should condemn the bill in the mind of every independent, liberty-loving man. [Applause.]

These are some of my reasons for opposing this bill. Our Democratic friends support the bill because they think it is a step toward free trade, and they inveigh in vigorous fashion against protection. Whatever evils exist in our country are charged by them to our protective policy. They are especially rabid against the trusts, which they claim are the product of protection. There are as many trusts in free-trade England as there are in this country, and they may as well be charged to free trade. Trusts are the natural results of prosperity. Great investments of capital are possible only in good times. If you want to destroy trusts, destroy prosperity.

We do not fear this cry against that system which has always brought prosperity to this country, and a violation of which has always brought business stagnation and adversity. Our people have not forgotten the lessons of the last few years. In 1892 we had prosperity. This same cry was made. It was heeded. The Democrats were successful. Their policy was adopted. Need I speak of the result? No. The people have not forgotten. In 1896 the Republicans were successful. Their policy was again inaugurated. Need I speak of the result? No. The people have not forgotten. It is true, Democratic policy crushed the trusts, but it also crushed everything else. [Applause.] The people prefer trusts along with prosperity to no trusts and no prosperity. Protection will be revised in the house of its friends. Your fulminations against it will do no more than using popguns shooting peas against the Rock of Gibraltar. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LACEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. R. 79. Joint resolution providing for the printing of 3,000 copies of each volume of the General Information Series, the annual publication of the Office of Naval Intelligence, Navy Department, in addition to the number now authorized by law.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2371) granting a pension to Andrew J. Felt.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 1512. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary Jane Faulkner;

S. 2082. An act granting an increase of pension to Louise Ward;

S. 4072. An act granting an increase of pension to Samuel J. Lambden; and

S. R. 56. Joint resolution providing for a modification in the adopted project for the improvement of Everett Harbor, Washington.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 11636. An act providing for the transfer of the title to the military reservation of Baton Rouge, La., to the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College; and

H. R. 12452. An act granting to the Mobile, Jackson and Kansas City Railroad Company the right to use for railroad purposes the tract of land at Choctaw Point, Mobile County, Ala., and now held for light-house purposes.

RECIPROCITY WITH CUBA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, the Cuban question and the manner of its settlement brings up so many grave matters of ultimate importance to the United States, involving our relations with foreign countries, our own possessions, the tariff, reciprocity, and similar issues, besides the question of a 20 per cent or greater reduction on sugar, tobacco, etc., coming from that island, that, if possible, every man in this House should be placed on record as to his views on these momentous problems which must largely govern our future prosperity.

Ever since the younger members of this House can remember we have heard the cry of "Cuba Libre," or "Free Cuba," and having personally had the opportunity of coming in contact with many from that island I know, in a measure, the great sacrifices her people have made during the past half century to throw off the yoke of Spanish rapacity, avarice, and arrogance of control which has kept back that island from taking her proper place among the civilized nations of the world; and it must have been with sincere and grateful feelings of pride and gratification when the Cubans—as they are an emotional people—realized the treaty of peace with Spain had been signed, and their blood undoubtedly tingled with joyousness as they felt that blessed word, which is firmly ingrafted in the hearts of all people—"freedom"—was about to be realized by them through the generosity of our nation, and was no longer to be a dream, but a real and an accomplished fact.

Our late beloved President and the American people generally had promised it to them and it was now to be carried out. All the misery of the past, the loss of relatives and friends and property, their sacrifices, had passed into history, and they had as consolation brightness, hope, and pleasure before them. And as with other nations in the past, the memory of their dead heroes and martyrs to the cause would live with them forever. The United States Government was about to place their destiny in their own hands, withdrawing its troops, and their own banner was to be raised over their land. They had, through their delegation, visited the White House, and seen our President and the Secretary of War, and they were assured that they would be treated with consideration, and that if they adopted the Platt amendment and agreed to make no prejudicial treaties with other lands, and carried out proper sanitary regulations, they could safely throw themselves upon our generosity.

The people of this country had only love and affection in their hearts for them. They wished and still wish only their welfare, and at least they are genuine and true. They knew not what might have been in the minds of the powers who control when the war was inaugurated, but at least no motive but philanthropy and honesty actuated the great public when they stood back of Congress and even urged them on to do away with Spanish control and this blot on civilization; and I believe no one will contradict, not even the outside world, that as a nation we entered into this issue with any but the purest motives. But all this was before Congress met and little can be said in commendation of our charity toward that island since. Caucus after caucus was held by our own party, and the gentlemen on the other side have had similar gatherings, but the more we have discussed the issue the less we now seem willing to do what was presumed by our people was intended, and also, presumably, was the intention of this House at one time.

Selfishness seems to have taken the place of honest purpose. Other issues have been allowed to creep in and blind us to the main point, and the apparent interest of our own people appears now to be more looked for, and the endeavor to drive a hard bargain with Cuba, than what should be our duty—simply to grant proper and prompt concessions to that island at this time. We should redeem our pledges like men. Give Cuba her liberty and allow her to start on her own destiny with hope and at least a fair chance of success as a nation, and not hamper her by innumerable conditions almost amounting to servitude.

It is well known that the only articles of importance grown on the island are sugar and tobacco, and it became evident even at the end of last year that owing to the overproduction of the world's supply there would be a heavy surplus, and prices fell so low, and are still so low, that it was undoubtedly correct the Cubans could not handle the present crop without a loss unless we extended a helping hand, as by the circumstances brought about by the war she had no market open to her at this time but our own. She has asked us to prevent misfortune from coming to her, even if it is not with her at present, by reducing our tariff, and unquestionably the sentiments of probably 75 to 80 per cent of our people are with her heart and soul in this request. It is immaterial how this feeling has been brought about, whether, as some state, it has been created, or is genuine.

Mr. DAHLE. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. DAHLE. Suppose the sugar trust has subsidized the newspapers of our country and thereby created a false impression, does not the gentleman think it is worth while to consider that?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I can simply say to the gentleman that I do not believe the sugar trust has had as much to do with the matter as the gentlemen representing the beet-sugar industry claim that they have. I am not going into the merits of that question now. I do not propose to consider the question as to what benefits the sugar trust may receive; that has been discussed very freely on the floor and is an open question, and I do not think it is worth while to take up time in discussing it now with the gentleman.

Mr. DAHLE. The gentleman says he doesn't consider it worth while to consider it. Does he not feel that it is worth while to consider why the situation is as it is?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I simply say that I believe the feeling is genuine. I believe it is sincere. I believe that 90 per cent, instead of 75 or 80 per cent, consider it a fact that we owe Cuba obligations which this House should sustain and carry out.

Mr. DAHLE. I understood the gentleman to say that he did not care——

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will repeat again what I said.

Mr. DAHLE. Does the gentleman think that, as a party, we should do that individually which we can not say is justifiable?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I believe the beet-sugar people have not exhibited that broad-mindedness on this question which, in my judgment, they should have shown. [Applause.]

Personally I believe that it is largely the latter, but it undoubtedly exists. It is in the air. It can be heard in all directions, and it will not be well for either party if it is not heeded.

I believe we should have met the question long since and fairly, as he who gives quickly gives twice, and that an allowance of at least 33⅓ per cent off the present tariff on sugar and tobacco should have been granted, so that instead of 30,000 tons of sugar only having been shipped up to the present time, a large portion of her crop would have been sent to this country before this date, and this concession should have been granted without any conditions whatsoever beyond those asked for under the Platt amendment.

The beet-sugar people have claimed and are claiming that we would injure their growing industry by such action, and I will freely admit that we may do so in a small degree and for a short time, as capital is timid, but all the evidence—and it certainly has been sufficient to convince anyone who was not absolutely committed to the opposite policy—shows that a concession of 30 per cent and probably much more can be made, and no ultimate injury would result to this great industry, which we all hope will yet be of importance and value as one of the industries of this country in the future. At this point I would like to say a word in regard to the singular statement that has been made on the floor of this House that when our tariff laws were framed excessive protection was accorded sugar and some other industries to the end that if necessary reductions might be made later in the tariff without injuring the said industries, or concessions could be granted as a means of reciprocity with other nations.

If such are the real facts, I can only say action of that kind was wrong and not justified in the people's interest at the time, as it forced them to pay more for the necessities of life than was just and fair; and if there exists cases of this kind besides sugar we should unearth them at once and reduce our tariff to meet the conditions existing, and the sooner the better.

The idea which seems to guide some of us that a tariff or other law made must hold, even if not for the good of the country, should not prevail, nor is it in line with Republican proper principles. I rather incline to the theory, however, that this has been an ingenious idea advanced by some fertile brain to present a plausible argument for favorable action and probably according to the debater's wishes and views of the question.

Our country, the world, and this House undoubtedly like a good fighter and a man who will maintain his position and stand by his convictions; but where we legislate for others and their interests, and our entire country, we should also expect to gain something for them if we win; but it hardly seems as if our beet-sugar friends have much to gain in result, no matter which way the question ends. If they lose they have injured themselves and have forced the Republican majority to win by Democratic votes and 20 per cent or more reduction on the tariff will be granted, and the agitation has brought about an unnecessary campaign issue. If they win they again can only do so by Democratic votes, Cuba is grievously hurt, we are discredited in the eyes of the world and in the views of most of our own citizens, and the day is only hurried forward when Cuba must apply to us for Territorial or State rights, and probably a much larger concession than appears now will be given, or perhaps absolute free trade.

Our Democratic friends undoubtedly will try and secure a vote on the removal of the differential on refined sugar, which our beet-sugar friends can hardly support; and, while all Republicans sympathize with them in this matter, it does seem at least unwise that they have forced the present position and gone to extremes without apparently any real advantage obtainable.

If there had been a proper concession without restrictions granted a month or more since, the question would now undoubtedly have died out and all would have been satisfactory. Personally I believe that even the sad sacrifice of our loss in brave men and the millions spent by us in the cause of Cuban liberation has not been enough, and that, having put our hand to the plow, we should finish the work, and that we owe it to ourselves to now go still further and make, if necessary, any additional moneyed sacrifice to place these people on their feet as a nation, free from debt, as well as free from the control of others.

But the old adage applies, "Heaven help us from our friends," and no sooner has Congress decided, somewhat grudgingly apparently, to give liberty than we begin to think of ourselves, and our own selfishness has seemingly absorbed us completely ever since.

Cuba is so close to our shores that we shall never be able to avoid close relations socially, politically, and in a business way. It is therefore eminently proper that no other nation should mix in her affairs or menace us by political alliance.

And we also have the right to ask that she continue to carry out a proper system of sanitary laws, as we have shown her what can be done in this way, and it has resulted greatly to her benefit, also removing the continual previous menace of yellow fever and other diseases from our own shores, and especially the southern portion of our country. But have we any right or justification in going further? Many think we have not, and Congress should give careful thought to this problem. The forcing on her of our contract-labor laws, our immigration laws, reciprocity, and 20 per cent special duty in our favor on American goods, and other like provisions do not appear in order, or even for our own ultimate interests. We are supposed to be a great, liberal, and broad-minded nation—at least it is said in this House almost daily that we are—and I believed it until lately, but am now beginning to doubt it.

Eighty millions of people giving freedom to 1,000,000, of whom likely not more than 100,000 to 200,000 are educated in the world's ways, the bulk of the inhabitants of Cuba being uneducated, simple, and almost children in knowledge, and yet we propose to force them to accept restrictions undoubtedly for their detriment unless they become one of us actually and throw in their final salvation with this country.

We all profess to hate hypocrisy, cant, and double dealing, but if we are not dealing in all these adjectives with Cuba and worse I do not realize the position.

The Ways and Means Committee and others say they are lovers of Cuba and their hearts bleed for her, and so they desire to give her 20 per cent, when they know she should have far more, and yet this is coupled with an additional statement that they will look after our own interests, and retard her pushing forward as she should do, restricting her productiveness, and that her money-making power must be cramped, and consequently her prosperity, by forcing her to adopt regulations which will prevent her from obtaining the cheap labor she needs to till her soil and multiply largely her sugar output, which, I think, all will admit she can do under proper conditions. This looks more like charity for others than for her. With her fertile soil and wonderful climate she could likely produce 3,000,000 tons of sugar within five years, owing to new methods of cultivation and labor-saving machinery, and by reason of this increased production she should likely be able as well to put raw sugar free on board vessels at her export ports at, likely, 40 to 50 per cent less cost than she can do to-day.

Now, I fully agree with every gentleman in this House that we do not wish Cuba full of Chinese coolies, South Sea Islanders, or West Indian laborers, but if that is our position let us say so frankly and not beat around the bush. The idea of dividing her lands up into small farms and making the country flourish as our own, in certain sections, is not likely to be accomplished. This is difficult in tropical countries, and the experience of the past in other lands has taught us that large tracts are more likely to be held and special rather than diversified crops raised. Yet, undoubtedly, if she was part of us and American capital went freely as it would to her shores, she would then grow rapidly prosperous, and there are many articles which we would likely find could be cultivated there to great advantage.

In regard to the question of trade with the islands, I fully indorse all that has been stated in reference to its possibilities and the business which we should likely do with these people, but with her nearness to us it does not seem that it is necessary that we should force her to give us 20 per cent special allowance off our goods. If the merchants of this country, and our manufacturers, and our producers of flour, bran, corn meal, cotton goods, lumber, and all articles can not secure the trade of that country without this concession, it appears to me that we had better go without it. But I do not believe for a moment that this is likely, but rather, owing to the favorable existing conditions, we will as easily secure it on an equal footing of tariff as through forced legislation. The reason why we have not done more with Cuba in the past is naturally understood, as she was under control of Spain. The Spaniards largely held the purse strings and obtained their supplies from the home market; and again, the Cubans were not specially friendly toward us, as they felt that we should have helped them in their struggles long ago, and it is certainly a grave problem whether we should now keep up this enmity, even if we have the power to make them bend to our will, rather than cultivate friendly relations, if they are to be a nation of their own, on proper and equitable principles.

We all fully understand that Cuba must raise a proper revenue to run her government, and that she must do this practically entirely through her tariff. If we reduce, therefore, her earning power on the start, say by 10 per cent, looking at her total imports, she probably will not have sufficient funds and will be cramped; it therefore should not appeal to anyone that we are justified in going to this extreme, but rather that she should be left open to frame her tariff law as may be best for her own interest.

Some have stated that if she does not like our propositions all she has to do is to reject them, which is a very plausible argument, but it does not stand investigation, as it is an undoubted fact, as one gentleman very aptly put it in speaking the other day, when stating it is questionable whether we would be willing that she should throw down the gauntlet to us and decline our proffered aid, going to some foreign nation and making a treaty of reciprocal interests so far as trade was in question.

I doubt if anyone on this floor will contradict that if she did so a howl of indignation at her want of gratitude would go up from one end of the land to the other, and we would claim she was tricky, unreliable, and that we should not allow it. Let us consider how we would like her to differentiate in favor of Germany or England on their goods, to the extent of, say, 30 per cent, and thus exclude us entirely from her markets. We again had better be honest with ourselves on this point, and recognize that while we have not told her, nor has she agreed in so many words, not to do anything of this kind, that we would not be satisfied to have her attempt it, so there appears to be nothing for her to do but accept whatever we may decide she must take, and this makes our duty plain, and alone should force us to be even overgenerous. She has traded for centuries with other nations, and I maintain that she should be still allowed to do so, certainly not on a more favored basis, but on an equality of tariff duty if she chooses.

We boast of our billion-dollar export business, yet we are afraid we will not get our share unless she gives us more favored conditions than others are granted. As she has practically no manufactories whatever on her island, as the Spaniards held her back from such advancement, the estimate of one hundred millions of import trade within a few years is not an over-sanguine estimate of what she will probably be able to reach. Let us get our share of it fairly and honestly, and if we have the enterprise that we credit ourselves with and the class of goods suited to her requirements we should not fear the result.

Some discussion has taken place regarding the broad question of reciprocity and its desirability, and it may be well to touch on this subject, as the Cuban question has brought up many points of vital issue as to our relations to others in the future. Reciprocity is one of the most beautiful theories which has been advanced within a century, but it requires many considerations to be entered into. First, there must be found two countries who desire to reciprocate. Then we must search for and find the lines of goods which will meet the issue. One country must have an article on which she can reduce her tariff for the benefit of the other country, if she is to receive similar reductions on one or more of her reciprocal articles, presuming, of course, both be nations with a tariff, and we must not forget that some are not.

Then these articles must be such as are especially indigenous to the country itself, so that, for instance, if we will lower our tariff on any article for the benefit of another country we can do so without injuring other lands who may be trading with us in similar articles, and the difficulty appears to be to find the necessary products which are covered by these conditions, and it not only seems but is almost impracticable and impossible, as, if you search the world over, except in a few special cases, they can not be found. We then must confront the condition of being willing to give an advantage to one country over another and take our chances as to the position which will be adopted by the countries that may be left out in the cold.

I think it will be generally conceded by anyone who will give the matter careful thought that if all nations of the earth take up the idea and try and practice it that it will result in a community of interests between a few and practical exclusion of trade relations with others, and in so far as our own country is concerned we will adopt such a variety of tariffs that it will be like a crazy quilt, and we will hardly be able to understand it ourselves. And while some are inclined to look lightly on the question of retaliation, it will not do to overlook this point. Nations will not be satisfied to have their goods shut out without looking around to see how they can protect themselves, and it simply means dividing the whole world into divisions, and risking bad feeling, discord, and trouble with those with whom we are not closely allied.

Many people are disposed to abandon reciprocity ideas for reasons given, and while we should not do this, but rather study the matter carefully, it will not do for us to go ahead too fast and to simply think that we can act our own pleasure and make trades here and there without regard to the interests of others besides the one with whom we make the alliance. We are to-day, as a nation, so far as I can see, most inconsistent, and are doing many things which will likely be prejudicial to our future good and welfare. We have shut the door of Porto Rico to other nations. We have also closed the door in the Hawaiian Islands. We have closed it partly in the Philippine Islands, and propose to do so entirely before long. And now Cuba comes in very likely for the same treatment, and we expect to shut others out; and yet all the time we are talking very loudly about the open door in other directions as China, Japan, India, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, etc., and we had better pause and consider.

We have also extended (or proposed to do so, although we have no ships to carry the cargo) our coastal laws to all of the possessions mentioned, even to the Philippine Islands, 10,000 miles away, after 1904.

The commercial bodies of other nations are giving these matters careful attention. Canada has discriminated against us and favors her home market. The question is being seriously agitated and discussed in New Zealand, also the federated Australian colonies have given it thought and discussed it. India is likely to consider it, and most certainly if the home Government in England should ask their colonies or indirectly convey to them the idea that it might be satisfactory to have English goods given the preference against the world these colonies would likely take her view of the question. I only mention England as we are especially friendly with her, but other nations occupy exactly the same status. I fail to see what arguments we could advance to have the action reversed if they went ahead. Having recently come into possession of new countries, we within two years shut out those who have traded with said countries for one hundred years or more. Gentlemen, we are likely by reason of these facts to perhaps lose rather than gain.

What would we think, or how would we treat the question if a number of the South American nations—and we must not lose sight of the fact that they are not special friends of this country, and are undoubtedly in their feelings and trade proclivities inclined toward Europe—should make reciprocity dealings with England or Germany or other nations, and thus perhaps force us to sacrifice a trade of many millions we may be now doing with them? Such a contingency would probably arouse us to decided action, and therefore we can hardly find fault with others for feeling as badly as we should, owing to the laws we are now arrogating to ourselves as proper to place on our statute books.

Just a few more words in reference to Cuba and the prospects of the island, and I would say I can not but thoroughly agree with a number of the speakers who have felt that her ultimate fate is to become part of us, joining in our Government and having all and every privilege which we enjoy. And it does seem as if this must come about, and is manifest destiny. It is doubtful whether the Cubans are thoroughly capable of self-government—and time can only determine this question. They are more of a poetical people than practical. They are more effervescent and emotional than quiescent. They are more dreamers than doers; more talkers than workers. They are fond of gaiety and amusement, but easily excited, and it will be difficult to settle among themselves the great questions which they will have to face. Yet they are a proud race, hospitable, generous, and unselfish, but they have not heretofore handled the grave questions of life with the hard reality of the Anglo-Saxon people, and probably never will be able to do so.

It does seem, therefore, before this question is finally closed, that we should let them understand fully that while we do not wish to force any action on their part nor take any measures which may be against their interests or do away with the possibility of their establishing their own government and having prosperity and success in so doing, and while we wish them every happiness in their venture, yet at the same time we desire them to know that should their steps falter we stand prepared to have them throw their fortunes in with ours, and like a weary child rest their head on our broad national breast, and that we believe thoroughly that if they do so and are willing to lay aside the sentiments of pride which all people have properly in governing themselves that they will be the better off and be cordially welcomed.

I am a firm believer that if this is done, and we meet them as friendly neighbors should, that they will feel that owing to the positions we occupy toward each other that it is wiser for them to soon meet us on this question and ask admittance into the United States on a proper plane, feeling that it is for their own happiness and prosperity. Meanwhile, I certainly hope that we shall give them a prompt and quick concession of tariff, and my only desire in stating these facts has been to make it plain that I feel that unless we do this we are not carrying out the moral and promised obligations and redeeming the pledges which undoubtedly we had given these people the right to think we would assume in their behalf; and while I shall vote for this measure if it is the best we can secure and grant, it is with sincere regret I feel we are not prepared to do more for her, and willing to avoid conditions which can not be satisfactory to her people, and I question are pleasing to our own nation.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I contemplated when the debate first began to give to the few members of the House that might be present at the time my views regarding the present question before us, but as I was marked to speak to-day at 3.25 and it is now 4.35, I will content myself by saying a very few words to my Republican friends.

A Democrat can take either side of this question and be consistent. He can either assume that he is a free trader and will not advocate legislation unless it accomplishes that, and satisfy his conscience, or he may say this is a step toward free trade, and my conscience is satisfied by voting for this.

Tariff legislation is party legislation wholly and absolutely. Tariff bills are framed as river and harbor bills are framed, only one is a party measure and the other is a general measure. In order to pass a tariff bill you must satisfy interests enough in your party to pass the measure. To pass a river and harbor bill you must satisfy interests enough on both sides of the House to pass that measure.

Now, I am a party man; I will follow where I can. I have followed the leaders of this House in days gone by—not always, but most always—many times against my better judgment, but as they have for the time been clothed with the power of leadership, I meekly followed. I have followed on revenue bills where the bill did not meet my full approval. Now, then, the mistake that the leaders of the House made here was in attempting tariff legislation upon one single industry. You never can frame a tariff measure, which is party legislation, until you shall take the question up as a whole, consulting with your party, and obtain out of it the best that can be obtained.

I do not agree with the gentleman from Washington, who spoke this morning, in condemning our leaders or the Committee on Rules or the Speaker. Our Democratic friends applauded this morning when he condemned the office of Speaker. Why, when you get control of this House, if you ever do, you will go to the Speaker yourself, just the same as you do now, and get consideration of a bill, and no other character of legislation can possibly be successful.

Now, our people in the West were not originally protectionists, because we had no interest that demanded protection. On the Pacific coast, as we are located, the iron and the steel and manufacturing industries of England are nearer to us than the manufacturing industries and the iron and steel of Pittsburg. We sent our wheat to England, and it was natural for them to return with the products of their factories.

Now, you educated us in protection; you told us the time would come when it would be beneficial to us. That time has come; we followed you, as I say, meekly in those days without deriving any benfit from protection. Now, we have upon the Pacific coast—and permit me to say there are no interests in my district—but we have upon the Pacific coast an industry that you have brought into existence, now struggling, as it is under your promise to continue protection as long as the Republican party shall remain in power, and now you turn and leave us to fight our battle alone. Now, you can afford and we can afford to fight our common enemy, but we can not afford as a party to betray the interests of any large portion of our party.

I have heard various reasons given for the passage of this bill. Some say reciprocity is to the advantage of trade. Well, if you want reciprocity for the advantage of trade, go to Germany, that has something to exchange with us, or go over to Australia, a progressive country. Let us see if we can not reciprocate on wool; and we have wool in California, too. But they have wool in Ohio. Now, if there is any advantage to come from reciprocal trade, we should have turned our face toward countries that have something to exchange with us—not a country like Cuba.

Others have said that we owe something to Cuba. I say no. Cuba has cost this nation of ours more than a thousand million dollars. I heard some gentlemen disputing here as to whether the cost of Cuba to us was $300,000,000 or $330,000,000. I say the cost has been more than a thousand million dollars as the result of freeing Cuba. I remember the discussion here on the Porto Rican bill when we gave back to Porto Rico the duties that had been collected because Porto Rico was poor. We have a debt in this country varying from $15 to $20 a head. Porto Rico has in the banks of New York to-day more than $4,000,000 that we returned to her, and she has not a debt of a single cent. She is richer than we are.

Now comes the question of extending charity to Cuba. I say again that she has cost us a thousand millions. I shall welcome the day when we can say to her, "Go in peace and take care of yourselves, if you can." If they can not take care of themselves now, the day will never come when they can. Man must first be taught to walk alone by himself. If he becomes an object of charity at the very inception of his career, you have encouraged him to be a pauper; and he will continue to be a pauper for the rest of his life.

I thank the House for its attention; I will not occupy further time.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, for more than a hundred years the United States looked with longing eyes upon the island of Cuba. Thomas Jefferson said that the only island he desired to have annexed to the United States was Cuba, because that was the only island that could be defended by the Army, while any other islands, if annexed, must be cared for by a Navy. President Buchanan offered $100,000,000 for Cuba; and it has been the dream of American statesmen from the foundation of our Government that the time would come when Cuba would be one of the States of the American Union. It was the irony of fate that the Spanish war, which cost us $300,000,000, should have left us in possession of Porto Rico, which we had never desired or thought of having; in the possession of 1,400 islands in the far-off Pacific, so far away that we did not even know their names and could not pronounce them if we did; that at the close of the war we should have found ourselves in possession of these scattered possessions, and yet that Cuba, the only one of the entire Spanish colonies that we ever wished for, was told to go free; and we solemnly declared by the Teller resolutions that we would give her a stable government; that we would give her independence of Spain, and that we would set her up among the nations to travel her road alone.

We intervened in Cuba because of two things: The blowing up of the Maine, and the further fact that it had become intolerable that we should have an Armenia within 90 miles of our own shores. Cuba has obtained her independence from Spain, and the question of giving her a stable government is now the next problem before us. We have cleared her ports of the yellow fever; we have given her an example of good government, and an example of "grafters" as well. We have shown her some of the best that is in us and some of the worst.

Cuba, traveling alone, a Spanish-American Republic, must travel the same thorny route that Mexico and the South American Republics have gone. The uncertainty of a Latin-American republican government is one of the difficulties that confront her people.

But we did not free ourselves at once from all responsibility. We have said to the world: "We will set this island up as an independent Republic." We are interested in the success of that experiment. And at the very outset the proposition is made to give her some reciprocal trade with us, exacting on the other hand like trade on her part for our industries. We thus propose to aid her at the start in the career of national life. In doing this we are told by some enthusiastic friends of the beet-sugar industry that we are violating the Republican platform. Mr. Chairman, let me read just one plank of the platform of 1896:

We believe the repeal of the reciprocity arrangements negotiated by the last Republican administration was a national calamity; and we demand their renewal and extension on such terms as will equalize our trade with other nations, remove the restrictions which now obstruct the sale of American products in the ports of other countries, and secure enlarged markets for the products of our farms, forests, and industries.

In 1900 we renewed that declaration in favor of reciprocity. We asserted in our platform that—

We favor the associated policy of reciprocity, so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce, in return for free foreign markets.

And President McKinley, in his address at Buffalo, his dying message to the people of the United States, made the statement that—

Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.

He said also that—

By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home protection we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus.

So, from a Republican standpoint, this proposition is a wise one and in direct harmony with the doctrines enunciated by the last two platforms of our party. Turn to the Dingley bill, section 4, and it expressly provides that the President shall negotiate treaties for a specified period not exceeding five years—of the duties imposed by this act to the extent of not more than 20 per cent upon such goods, wares, and merchandise as may be designated therein of the country or countries with which such treaty or treaties shall be made, as in this section provided for.

So that the doctrine of reciprocity has been twice put in the platform of our party by our great national conventions, and we have gone to victory with the banner of reciprocity flying over our heads, and the author of the McKinley bill declared in his last message to the people of the United States the propriety of carrying out the principles of that bill so far as reciprocity was concerned.

I appeal to the memory of Nelson Dingley. A more thorough, practical, and sensible protectionist has never lived than he, and he wrote in the statutes of the United States the provision in regard to reciprocity which I have just read. Therefore from a Republican standpoint it is wise; from a Republican standpoint it is in accordance with our party principles and party doctrines. But it is said that this policy is not good for the United States. The British merchants are very keen and quick to scent any advantage that we may have over them. On the 11th day of March delegates from a number of British chambers of commerce visited the foreign secretary, Lord Landsdowne, at the foreign office and—presented a memorial relative to British trade with Cuba, pointing out that it was feared that when the administration of that island was handed over to the Cubans a reciprocity treaty would be negotiated, admitting Cuban produce into the United States at reduced duties and granting corresponding preferential terms to American products and manufactures by Cuba.

I quote this from the Star of this city of the 11th day of March, published at a time when the party of protection was holding conferences in this Hall from day to day and endeavoring to agree upon some fair basis of reciprocity with the island of Cuba. Those trade associations in Great Britain say in their memorial:

The United States when declaring war on Spain expressly stated their action would be limited to freeing Cuba from Spanish rule. It was therefore anticipated by those in Europe engaged in trade with Cuba that no measures would be adopted at the conclusion of the war which would restrict or destroy their trade with that island. Such a reciprocity treaty as they anticipated would undoubtedly put an end to European trade with the island. The chambers, therefore, most earnestly request that the utmost effort be made by His Majesty's minister at Washington to prevent the signing of any such treaty, or at least to secure that most favored treatment be continued by Cuba to this country. It is represented that French and German interests might suffer by a reciprocal treaty, and it is suggested a joint protest might be effectual in preventing a change adverse to the interests of Europe in the trade with Cuba.

So, Mr. Chairman, it is evident that the mercantile interests in the old world look with some apprehension upon the advantages that we will have in making this arrangement with our neighboring island. If we throw off 20 per cent from our duties and she will deduct 20 per cent from hers, it will undoubtedly result in a largely increased trade between the two countries. In the last year Cuba imported agricultural products valued at $24,371,808, of which the United States furnished $12,137,708. The total imports to Cuba last year were $65,050,141, of which the United States sent $28,078,702. Now, the trade of the United States to that island will greatly increase if we adopt a reciprocal agreement to foster such trade. It is complained that Americans have bought land in that island. Is that a reason why we should discriminate against the island?

Certainly, instead of that being an argument against reciprocity, it is an additional reason why we should give reciprocity to an island where our own people are investing their capital. We, under the Platt amendment, retain a hold upon the island of Cuba. We give her independence, it is true, but she has to stay under the wing of the United States of America. We provide for coaling stations; we provide that she shall be subject to certain obligations to us, and that those obligations are to continue in the future after our evacuation of that island; and we justly and rightfully make these requirements, because we have spent more than $300,000,000 in securing to the people of that beautiful land the freedom which they are hereafter to enjoy. Not until recently have I believed that we would ever leave Cuba. Not until lately had I thought that Cuba would consent for us finally to withdraw. I said in a speech in 1898, when the treaty of Paris was pending, that we "would get out of Cuba when we got out of Dubuque," and of course we could not get along without Dubuque.

But we still hold interests in Cuba. We hold her in leading strings, not for our advantage but for hers.

We have profited by the experience that Mexico has undergone. For more than fifty years that country was in a state of brigandage. When Bayard Taylor crossed Mexico about 1850 he was robbed three times between Vera Cruz and Acapulco. Now you can take a bicycle and wheel undisturbed and safe through the entire republic of Mexico. But it has taken time to bring this about. Spanish republics have had stormy histories. And Cuba, we must remember, has gone through hardships and suffered desolation beyond anything that any country on this side of the globe has ever endured.

It has been said, and well said, that the growth of population in a country is the best test of whether or not the government of that country is a wise one and adapted to its wants. Measured by that test the island of Porto Rico has had a good government, because she has a population as numerous as Belgium. Measured by that test Cuba has had the worst government in the world, because her population has declined and the island has been a wreck—a wreck brought about by civil war and by bad government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we are interested in the future prosperity and success of that island. We can not be indifferent to her welfare. Will giving this slight reduction in the duty injure any interest in the United States? We have heard from no interest here except the beet root, and the claim has been made that this is merely a sugar question. But it includes every article that Cuba exports to the United States. It includes every article that we import into the island of Cuba; and it is therefore not simply a proposition as to sugar alone but as to all the articles of Cuban commerce.

We have to-day an ad valorem equivalent of about 89 per cent on sugar. If we take off 20 per cent of that, that is, about 19 per cent, it leaves an equivalent of about 70 per cent. And yet gentlemen say that if you take that off you ruin the beet-sugar industry of this country.

It is said that it is a lusty infant, that it is making wonderful progress, that the weather and the soil and the rains all combine to adapt this country to the growth of the beet root, and that in a little time we can produce all of the sugar that we need for our own use and for sugar to export. And yet they tell us, immediately after that statement, that if we reduce that duty from 89 per cent ad valorem to 70 per cent ad valorem we will destroy that industry. Mr. Chairman, you can not reconcile these two statements. If 70 per cent will not foster and encourage and aid this industry in its establishment in this country, surely the industry is not one adapted to its surroundings, and no amount of pampering can make a success of it. I believe it will be successful. I believe the beet industry will prosper, and that this slight reduction in duties, still leaving 70 per cent upon the product, is much more than is necessary to fully protect and give that industry an advantage over every sugar-producing country upon the globe.

The suggestion is made that we should, in connection with the question of Cuban reciprocity, lower the differential on refined sugar coming from Germany, France, and other sugar-producing countries. This question has no proper connection with the subject of general reciprocity with Cuba. The proposed concession to Cuba is not a mere sugar question, but involves the horizontal reduction of the Cuban tariff on all American goods imported into Cuba, and on the other hand an equal reduction of 20 per cent on all Cuban products shipped to us. The discussion on the part of the opponents of the bill has proceeded upon the theory that Cuban products mean sugar and nothing else, and that therefore the whole sugar question, world-wide, they say, is opened by the bill. I do not so regard it. But should the Committee of the Whole conclude, without regard to the parliamentary rules of proceeding, to take up the question of the differential and report that question to the House, I shall certainly vote as I deem best upon the merits of the question and for a reduction of the duty.

If the gentlemen who oppose this bill enter upon any alliance with the opposition by which they shall open up the sugar schedule generally, they must not at all be surprised if, instead of merely having a 20 per cent concession to Cuba, they will encounter an additional concession on the differential to other countries. The responsibility of considering this question is with them. If opened up, then the refined-sugar schedule will be before the House upon its merits and will have to be treated as an independent proposition, and I shall vote upon that schedule on its own merits and shall favor a reduction of the differential. I favor this bill, whether the differential feature is in it or not, and would have liked the bill still better if the amount of the reciprocal concession had been more than the 20 per cent limit fixed by its terms. [Applause.]

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12765) to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SHIPMENTS OF HORSES, ETC., TO SOUTH AFRICA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

Mr. HOAR. I present a petition of Confederate officers who were engaged in the battle of Balls Bluff, and other citizens of Virginia, praying for an appropriation to preserve the soldiers' cemetery and the battlefield there. The matter involves a small appropriation.

This is a very interesting historical document, indicating a friendly and kindly feeling on the part of those officers toward the men with whom they were in conflict. It consists of but a few lines, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD, with the signatures.

I also present the petition of Gen. John W. Kimball and other veterans of the civil war, members of the Fifteenth Massachusetts Volunteers, who took part on the other side. I ask that this petition, with the signatures, may likewise be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petitions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned citizens of Loudoun County, Va., residing near Balls Bluff, have learned that certain veterans of the United States Army who were engaged in the battle of Balls Bluff, fought on October 21, 1861, and who displayed there signal gallantry under adverse circumstances, have presented to your honorable body a memorial asking that the United States Government will purchase at least a portion of the lands upon which that battle was fought and which are contiguous to the national cemetery already established there and a right of way thereto from the neighboring highway. We cordially concur in the said memorial and pledge our hearty cooperation in preserving the battlefield from devastation and in keeping the landmarks intact and in carrying out the purposes for which it is proposed for the United States Government to purchase said property. We call attention to the fact that there is now no public approach or open way to said national cemetery.

E. V. White, colonel, Confederate States Army, and president of the People's National Bank, of Leesburg, Va.; Wm. B. Lynch, captain, Confederate States Army, and president of the National Bank of Leesburg, Va.; W. E. Garrett, captain Company I, Eighth Virginia Infantry, and was in Balls Bluff battle; A. H. Wildman, Jos. E. Schooley.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists respectfully represent that they are citizens and were formerly in the military service of the United States in the civil war of 1861-1865; that they were engaged in the action commonly known as the battle of Balls Bluff, near Leesburg, Va., October 21, 1861; that this battle, though the number of men engaged on each side was not large, attracted public attention throughout the country to an unusual degree and had a material influence on the conduct of the war; that the commander of the Union forces, Maj. Gen. Edward D. Baker, of California, a man greatly distinguished in civil life, was killed there; that the regiments engaged on the Union side, and there for the first time under fire, the Fifteenth and Twentieth Massachusetts, the Forty-second New York, and the Seventy-third Pennsylvania Volunteers, were all greatly distinguished for their valor and prowess, their losses in the great battles of the war being remarkably large; that in the year 1865, a small national cemetery, about 50 feet square, was inclosed and the bodies of the dead, almost all unknown, who fell in the action were buried there; that this little cemetery has been neglected, and the inclosing wall has been allowed to fall into ruin; that the place has been repeatedly visited by considerable parties of survivors of the action with their families and friends, who were grieved by its ruinous and forlorn aspect.

Your memorialists therefore respectfully and earnestly pray that a tract of land of reasonable extent, including the site of the action at Balls Bluff, may be acquired by the United States, and such disposition made thereof as to secure a permanent and becoming memorial of the patriotism and gallantry of the men who fought and died there in defense of the integrity and honor of their country.

John W. Kimball, major, Fifteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, brevet brigadier-general, United States Volunteers; John M. Studley, late captain, Fifteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, lieutenant-colonel, Fifty-first Massachusetts Volunteers; Thomas J. Hastings, late captain, Fifteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers; J. Evarts Irwin, formerly captain, Fifteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers; E. J. Russell, formerly captain, Fifteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers; Amos Bartlett; Henry S. Tafft, late captain, Fifteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, brevet lieutenant-colonel, United States Volunteers; George W. Mirick; Henry E. Smith, color bearer Fifteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Militia; Edward A. Rice; William H. Andrews, Company D, Fifteenth Massachusetts Volunteers; Josiah W. Wilder, Company B, Fifteenth Massachusetts Volunteers; Albert H. Foster, Company F, Fifteenth Massachusetts Volunteers; Charles H. Bartlett, Company F, Fifteenth Massachusetts Volunteers; Josiah C. Converse, Company F, Fifteenth Massachusetts Volunteers; John E. Pharnes, Company K, Fifteenth Massachusetts Volunteers; Theodore Lanston, Company H, Fifteenth Massachusetts Volunteers; David M. Earle, captain, Fifteenth Massachusetts Volunteers; Robert Welsh, Company K, Fifteenth Massachusetts Volunteers; L. D. Goddard, Company D, Fifteenth Massachusetts Volunteers; Peleg F. Murray, Company E, Fifteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers.

Mr. QUAY presented petitions of Hurst Post, No. 86, of Camptown; of John S. Bittner Post, No. 122, of Pennsylvania; of William H. Moody Post, No. 155, of Pittsburg; of Sergeant William I. Furst Post, No. 419, of Stormstown; of General William H. Kein Post, No. 76, of Reading; of Perkins Post, No. 202, of Athens; of Capt. Thomas Espy Post, No. 153, of Carnegie, all of the Department of Pennsylvania, Grand Army of the Republic, and of Circle No. 88, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Sharpsville, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation providing pensions to certain officers and men in the Army and Navy of the United States when 50 years of age and over, and to increase pensions of widows of soldiers to $12 per month; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to the personal representatives of Joshua Hill, deceased, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Georgia, $6,602.79, as Senator from March 4, 1867, the date upon which the vacancy he was elected to fill began, to July 29, 1868, from which date his compensation as Senator began.

UNION RAILROAD STATION.

Mr. McMILLAN I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 4825) to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read in full to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and read to line 15 on page 3.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. How is the bill before the Senate? What is its parliamentary situation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia and is in charge of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN]. He asks unanimous consent for its present consideration, and it is now being read to the Senate for information.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If it is to be read for information, subject to objection, I do not object, but it strikes me that the bill can not be taken up for consideration now. Still I shall not object to its being read for information.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill and read to the bottom of page 3.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I will interpose an objection to the consideration of the bill now. It is evidently a bill of considerable length. It is quite an important bill, and it will have to take some time for consideration.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not understand that the Senator objects to the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator does object.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes; I object to it. It is a long bill, and I think it may as well be read when it comes up for consideration.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that the bill be considered now. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. GALLINGER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There are a good many Senators who have not had an opportunity to examine the bill. I have heard it discussed in an informal way by Senators and a good deal of doubt expressed about the propriety of its passage. I for one have not had time to understand fully what is in it. I do not, of course, ask the Senate to postpone it for that reason, but I do think it ought to be more carefully and more fully understood by members of the Senate than it is now. The consideration of the bill ought not to be pressed at this time. I hope the Senator from Michigan will allow the bill to go over for a day or two.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator will allow the bill to be read I will let it go over. Since the reading has been commenced I should like to have it read through.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not object to its being read except for the time it will take.

Mr. McMILLAN. It will not take very long.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will be resumed.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in section 1, page 2, line 4, after the word "continuing," to strike out "along" and insert "under the west side of;" so as to read:

thence curving to the northward, crossing over Canal street and South Capitol street with a clearance of not less than 14 feet above the curbs thereof; thence passing under the intersection of D street with New Jersey avenue, C street SE., and B street SE. at the intersection with First street; thence continuing under the west side of First street to near E street NE; thence curving to the eastward, crossing under the proposed circle at Massachusetts avenue to a connection with the tracks in the proposed terminal station to be built on the north side of Massachusetts avenue hereinafter provided for.

Mr. McMILLAN. I offer an amendment to the bill, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, on page 6, line 19, after the word "on," it is proposed to strike out "each;" in the same line, before the word "westerly," to strike out "easterly and the," and in line 20, before the word "of," to strike out "sides" and insert "side;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That on the westerly side of said railway station sufficient land for a street not less than 40 feet in width shall be dedicated to the District of Columbia by the said railroad company and said terminal company.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. I offer another amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, on page 9, line 18, after the word

"upon," it is proposed to strike out "square" and insert "squares;" and in line 19, after the word "eleven," to insert "712 and 713;" so as to read:

and also within the city of Washington in, over, and upon the bed of Second street, between M and N streets, and in and upon squares 711, 712, and 713, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. I offer another amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 5, on page 12, line 2, after the word "and," it is proposed to strike out "the west 40 feet of Delaware avenue;" and in line 4, after the word "and," to insert "so much of the bed of Delaware avenue as lies west of a line drawn parallel with the east building line of said avenue, and 40 feet westerly therefrom."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 9, on page 20, line 16, after the words "And provided further," it is proposed to strike out:

That the right to institute condemnation proceedings as authorized in this section shall cease and expire two years after the date of approval of this act.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That any property owner whose land is included within such location shall have the right, within two years, to begin proceedings to compel the appropriation of said land by said company and the payment of damages in the same manner as if the proceedings had been instituted by the company under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk, to come in on page 24, line 18.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 12, on page 24, line 18, after the word "thereto," it is proposed to strike out "and to authorize the use of."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, I ask that a reprint may be made of the bill as it has been amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks that the bill be reprinted as amended, and that it take its place again on the Calendar.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask that the numbering of section 12 be changed to 13.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerks will attend to the renumbering of the sections. If there be no objection, the reprint of the bill, with the amendments which have been made, will be ordered.

Mr. SPOONER. Have the amendments been adopted?

Mr. McMILLAN. The amendments which have been recommended by the committee have been adopted.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I thought the understanding was that the consideration of this bill was to go over after it should have been read, without acting upon the amendments.

Mr. McMILLAN. I merely wanted the amendments which have been offered to be printed in the bill, so that Senators may see precisely what they are.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have no objection to the amendments being printed in the bill, but I do not want them printed in the bill as having been agreed to. Let them be printed as being offered, subject to action hereafter.

Mr. McMILLAN. Very well. All I care for is to have the amendments which have been submitted appear in the reprint of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have no objection to their being reprinted so as to appear in the bill, but my objection is to having them regarded as agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments have all been agreed to. Shall they be reconsidered?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The agreement was in the beginning, when the consideration of the bill was asked, that if I would withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill it might be read and then go over. There was no intention that a lot of amendments should be agreed to at this time.

Mr. McMILLAN. Very well. Let the amendments be reprinted as pending.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am perfectly willing that the amendments be printed as pending, but they certainly should not be adopted at this time in the face of the agreement which was made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the vote by which the various amendments have been adopted will be regarded as reconsidered, and the bill will be ordered to be reprinted with the amendments in the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. But not considered as adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not considered as adopted. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. McMILLAN. I wish to give notice that in the first part of next week—say on Tuesday or Wednesday, during the morning hour—I shall call up the bill for further consideration.

Mr. PATTERSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which I ask to have read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 9 it is proposed to insert the following:

Add at the end of section 9:

"and any railroad company whose tracks may or shall connect with or intersect the tracks of any of the companies hereinbefore named shall have the right to move its passenger traffic over the tracks so connected with or intersected, and to use the main passenger station and terminals hereinbefore provided for upon such terms as may be agreed upon between such railroad company and the company or companies owing said tracks, station, or terminals; and in case of failure on part of any of such companies to agree about such use either as to terms, accommodations, schedules or otherwise, the matters in dispute shall be submitted to the supreme court of the District of Columbia in equity term for its determination upon the petition of either party to the controversy, and jurisdiction to hear and consider such disputes and to finally adjudicate the same according to principles of equity and the very right of the matter, and to enforce its orders or decrees in such respect is hereby conferred upon said supreme court."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be ordered to be printed and lie upon the table.

Mr. MONEY. I should like to make an inquiry. I do not understand the status of the bill reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, which has been pending, and I ask what it is?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is on the Calendar under Rule VIII, and has been read.

Mr. MONEY. And no time fixed for its consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No time has been fixed for its consideration.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN] has given notice that he will move to take up the bill on Monday or Tuesday next.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes; I gave that notice.

Mr. MONEY. Very well.

GRANT OF LANDS TO COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO.

Mr. TELLER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4148) to grant certain lands to the city of Colorado Springs, Colo.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I give notice that after this bill has been considered, I shall ask for the regular order. I think we ought to go to the Calendar.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator from Massachussetts will amend that and say after this bill and the next one have been considered.

Mr. LODGE. After this bill and the amendment to the rules proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] shall have been considered I shall ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4148) to grant certain lands to the city of Colorado Springs, Colo.; which has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, after the word "twenty-eight," in line 5, page 1, to strike out:

All of south half of section 29 not included in the United States Military Reservation; all of northeast quarter of section 31 not included in the United States Military Reservation; all of southeast quarter of section 31; all of northwest quarter of section 32 not included in the United States Military Reservation.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

All of south half of section 29 not included in the grant made to the city of Colorado Springs under the act of Congress approved April 24, 1896; all of northeast quarter of section 31 not included in the grant to the city of Colorado Springs under the act of Congress approved April 24, 1896; all of southeast quarter of section 31; all of northwest quarter of section 32 not included in the grant made to the city of Colorado Springs under the act of Congress approved April 24, 1896.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described tracts of land, situate in the county of El Paso and State of Colorado, described as follows: All of south half of south half of section 28; all of south half of section 29 not included in the grant made to the city of Colorado Springs under the act of Congress approved April 24, 1896; all of northeast quarter of section 31 not included in the grant to the city of Colorado Springs under the act of Congress approved April 24, 1896; all of southeast quarter of section 31; all of northwest quarter of section 32 not included in the grant made to the city of Colorado Springs under the act of Congress approved April 24, 1896; all of northeast quarter, all of southwest quarter, and all of north half of southeast quarter of section 32; all of north half, all of north half of southwest quarter, all of southwest quarter of southwest quarter, all of north half of southeast quarter, and all of southeast quarter of southeast quarter of section 33. All of the above-described land is in township 14 south, range 68 west, of sixth principal meridian. Also, all of east half of northeast quarter and all of north half of south half of section 4, township 15 south, range 68 west, of sixth principal meridian; all of north half of southeast quarter, all of west half of northeast quarter, and all of northwest quarter of section 5, township 15 south, range 68 west, containing 2,181.5 acres, more or less, be, and the same are hereby, granted and conveyed to the city of Colorado Springs, in the county of El Paso and State of Colorado, upon the payment of $1.25 per acre by said city to the United States, to have and to hold said lands to its use and behoof forever for purposes of water storage and supply of its waterworks; and for said purposes said city shall forever have the right, in its discretion, to control and use any and all parts of the premises herein conveyed, and in the construction of reservoirs, laying such pipes and mains, and in making such improvements as may be necessary to utilize the water contained in any natural or constructed reservoirs upon said premises.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, however, That the grant hereby made is, and the patent issued hereunder shall be, subject to all legal rights heretofore acquired by any person or persons in or to the above-described premises, or any part thereof, and now existing under and by virtue of the laws of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. H. CROOK, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 17th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 2063) granting a pension to Ida S. McKinley; and

An act (S. 1178) providing for an additional circuit judge in the second judicial circuit.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No., 1093, being Senate resolution 187, in regard to an amendment of the rules.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, reported by Mr. SPOONER from the Committee on Rules on the 12th instant:

Resolved, That Rule I, clause 4, be amended by inserting after the words "Vice-President," in the first line thereof, the words "or whenever the powers and duties of the President shall devolve on the Vice-President," so that the clause when amended shall read as follows:

"In event of the death of the Vice-President, or whenever the powers and duties of the President shall devolve on the Vice-President, the President pro tempore shall have the right to name, in writing, a Senator to perform the duties of the Chair during his absence; and the Senator so named shall have the right to name in open session, or in writing, if absent, a Senator to perform the duties of the Chair, but such substitution shall not extend beyond adjournment, except by unanimous consent."

And further, by direction of the same committee, I give notice in writing of said proposed amendment to the fourth clause of the first rule, and that the purpose thereof is to so change the language of clause 4 that it will cover contingencies not now provided for.

Mr. SPOONER. In line 12 of the resolution I move to strike out the semicolon and insert a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed.

MEMORIAL TO ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. WETMORE. I am directed by the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5269) to provide a commission to secure plans and designs for a monument or memorial to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to create a commission to be composed of the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of War, to secure plans and designs for a monument or memorial to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, and appropriates $25,000 to carry out the provisions of the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let us have the regular order, Mr. President.

BRIDGE ACROSS MANATEE RIVER, FLORIDA.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4768) to authorize the United States and West Indies Railroad and Steamship Company, of the State of Florida, to construct a bridge across the Manatee River in the State of Florida.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of this bill, but after it has been considered I shall ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported by the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 2, page 2, line 8, after the word "route," to insert:

Upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails and troops and munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to the said bridge.

In line 13, after the word "and," to insert "it;" and in line 14, after the words "United States," to insert:

And the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal telegraph and telephone purposes, and all telegraph and telephone companies shall have equal rights and privileges in crossing said bridge with their lines.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as post route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails and troops and munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to the said bridge; and it shall enjoy the same rights and privileges as other post roads in the United States; and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal telegraph and telephone purposes, and all telegraph and telephone companies shall have equal rights and privileges in crossing said bridge with their lines.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 3, line 5, after the word "construction," to insert "or after completion;" so as to read:

And should any changes be made in the plans of said bridge during the progress of construction or after completion such changes shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, and all changes in said bridge required by the Secretary of War at any time, or its entire removal, shall be at the expense of the corporation owning or operating said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 10, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall be entitled to equal rights and privileges in the passage of railroad trains over the same, and the approaches thereto, upon the payment of a reasonable compensation therefor, and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any one of them, desiring such use shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon the rules and conditions to which each shall conform in the use of said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 21, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 5. That if the bridge built under authority of this act shall be built as a drawbridge, the draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats, and whatever kind of bridge is constructed, the owner or owners thereof shall maintain thereon, at their own expense, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 3, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 6. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 7, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 7. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LONDON DOCK CHARGES.

Mr. NELSON. The printed copies of the hearings before the Committee on Commerce on the London dock charge bill are exhausted. I ask unanimous consent that the hearings may be reprinted as a Senate document, together with certain appendices which were omitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

CONSULS ACTING IN FIDUCIARY CAPACITY.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to call up the bill (S. 4762) to prevent any consular officer of the United States from accepting any appointment from any foreign state as administrator, guardian, or to any other office of trust, without first executing a bond, with security, to be approved by the Secretary of State.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

H. GLAFCKE.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 3401) for the relief of H. Glafcke. It is a bill of only six lines, and there is no objection to it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to H. Glafcke $110.39, being the balance due for necessary traveling expenses as deputy collector of internal revenue for the district of Colorado for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1900.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT KALAMAZOO, MICH.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Calendar the bill (S. 280) to provide for enlarging the public building at Kalamazoo, Mich.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment on page 2, line 3, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "sixty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the public building at Kalamazoo, in the State of Michigan, now occupied as a post-office and for other Government offices, to be enlarged so as to make said building suitable for the further and better accommodation of the post-office, the plans and specifications to be drawn, with respect to the present building, so as to furnish to the post-office more room and better accommodations. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for the addition, enlargement, and improvement of said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not cost to exceed the sum of $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF ELI AYERS, DECEASED.

Mr. MONEY. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. 877) to quiet the titles of certain lands in the State of Mississippi, and for the relief of the estate of Eli Ayers, deceased.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I will have to object to that this morning. The bill can not be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MONEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, notwithstanding the objection made.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The motion is not debatable, I believe?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; it is not. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to proceed to the consideration of the bill, notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, is it in order to present a conference report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is at any time except pending a roll call.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10847) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 20, 29, 30, 35, 36, 37, 38, 41, 42, 49, 50, 55, 56, 57, 60, 61, 67, 68, 78, 80, 83, 85, 95, 98, 105, 106, 108, 109, 124, 125, 130, 131, 139, 147, 148, 163, 174, 175, 177, 178, 180, 199, 200, 203, and 205.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 25, 26, 31, 32, 33, 34, 39, 40, 43, 47, 51, 52, 59, 62, 63, 64, 65, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 81, 82, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 93, 94, 96, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 107, 110, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 126, 127, 128, 129, 132, 133, 135, 138, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 146, 150, 151, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 176, 181, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 195, 197, 198, 201, 204, 207, 210, 211, 212, and 214, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$75,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 13 of the bill, in line 2, after the word "each," insert the words "additional laborer in the bathroom, $720;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$91,530;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$720;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$26,200;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 15 of the bill, in line 3, after the word "Judiciary," insert the word "Library;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$79,600;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,400;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 209, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$65,140;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 213, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows:

Add at the end of the matter inserted by said amendment the following:

"And the several appropriations herein made for such clerks and employees under the several departments and offices shall be available for payment of the salaries of all clerks and employees transferred to the classified service under this provision. And the appropriations made for such temporary clerks and employees for the fiscal year 1902 shall also be available for payment of the salaries of all such clerks and employees herein transferred for the balance of the current fiscal year."

And on page 79 of the bill, in line 4, strike out all after the word "dollars" down to and including the word "appropriations," in line 9.

And the Senate agree to the same.

S. M. CULLOM,
F. E. WARREN,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

HENRY H. BINGHAM,
J. A. HEMENWAY,
L. T. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD a brief statement showing the result of the conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The statement submitted by the Senator from Illinois will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

Legislative, 1903.

Amount of bill as passed House	$25,174,669.90
Net increase made by Senate	315,875.60
Amount of bill as passed Senate	25,490,545.50

Of the increase made by the Senate of $315,875.60, the House has agreed to $223,711.60, and the Senate has receded from $92,164, making the total of bill as agreed to in conference $25,398,381.50.

ESTATE OF ELI AYERS, DECEASED.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 877) to quiet the titles of certain lands in the State of Mississippi, and for the relief of the estate of Eli Ayers, deceased, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. I will transfer that pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and vote "nay."

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. FOSTER]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. MITCHELL. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], who has been detained from the Senate by sickness in his family. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BERRY. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS]. Unless he has voted I withhold my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted, the Chair is informed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. I do not know how he would vote if present.

Mr. PLATT of New York (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEITFELD] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the senior Senator from Idaho has not voted.

Mr. PLATT of New York. Then I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—24.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has voted. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, the morning hour will be out before the roll can be called, and——

Mr. COCKRELL. It has to be called.

Mr. MONEY. I do not care to——

Mr. COCKRELL. The roll will have to be called.

Mr. LODGE. There is nothing in order but a call of the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Mississippi that the roll call has shown that there is not a quorum present, and therefore no business is in order until a quorum appears.

Mr. MONEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LODGE. Until a quorum is developed surely nothing is in order.

Mr. MONEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and it is directed to the President of the Senate, and not to any member of the Senate. I want to know from the President of the Senate whether I am at liberty to withdraw the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER The Chair understands that no business can be transacted until a quorum appears.

Mr. MONEY. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon,	Frye,	McMillan,	Quay,
Bard,	Gallinger,	Mallory,	Rawlins,
Bate,	Gibson,	Martin,	Scott,

Cockrell,	McComas,	Platt, Conn.	Wetmore.
Dillingham,	McCumber,	Platt, N. Y.
Dolliver,	McLaurin, Miss.	Quarles,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question before the Senate is——

Mr. MONEY. It is almost 2 o'clock now, and it will be useless to take the bill up to-day. I withdraw the motion, if that is the pleasure of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that he may have leave to withdraw the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. Unanimous consent has been granted to the Senator from Mississippi for the withdrawal of the motion.

COURTS IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 5105) fixing the terms of the circuit and district courts in and for the district of South Dakota, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 2295.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read. Is it the desire of the Senator from Massachusetts that the amendments of the committee shall be acted upon as they are reached?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. It was agreed yesterday that the bill should be read by paragraphs for amendment, and that the committee amendments should be considered as they were reached.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Philippines was in section 1, page 2, after line 12, to strike out "said Commission may be increased to not exceeding eleven members, and the future;" in line 14, before the word "appointments," to insert "future," and in line 15, before the word "members," to strike out "and;" so as to make the paragraph read:

Future appointments of civil governor, vice-governor, members of the Commission, and heads of executive departments shall be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. RAWLINS. What was the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the Secretary proceed to read the bill, and that the Senate consider the amendments proposed by the committee as they are reached in their order in the reading.

Mr. LODGE. That was agreed to yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that that was the agreement which was entered into yesterday.

Mr. RAWLINS. I was not aware of the agreement.

Mr. LODGE. I simply made the usual request, which was agreed to, that the bill should be read by paragraphs for amendment, the amendments of the committee to be considered first.

Mr. RAWLINS. That is all right.

Mr. LODGE. That was agreed to yesterday.

Mr. PETTUS. I hope that understanding does not mean that it is final action on the amendments.

Mr. LODGE. Of course not. It is the usual practice on appropriation bills. It cuts off absolutely nothing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Philippines was, in section 2, page 2, line 21, after the word "matters," to strike out "except the admiralty jurisdiction of the supreme court and courts of first instance;" in line 24, after the word "law," to strike out ". SEC. 3. That" and insert "; and;" and on page 3, line 5, before the word "Commission," to insert "Philippine," and in the same line, after the word "Commission," to insert:

Provided, That the admiralty jurisdiction of the supreme court and courts of first instance shall not be changed except by act of Congress.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the supreme court, courts of first instance, and municipal courts of said islands shall possess and exercise jurisdiction as heretofore provided by said Commission, subject in all matters to such alteration and amendment as may be hereafter enacted by the Commission or otherwise enacted by law; and the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court shall hereafter be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The judges of the court of first instance shall be appointed by the civil governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Philippine Commission: Provided, That the admiralty jurisdiction of the supreme court and courts of first instance shall not be changed except by act of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 3, page 3, line 9, before the word "taken," to insert the word "heretofore;" so as to read:

SEC. 3. That the action of the President of the United States heretofore taken by virtue of the authority vested in him as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, as set forth in his order of July 12, 1898, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 20, to insert:

SEC. 4. That all inhabitants of the Philippine Islands continuing to reside therein who were Spanish subjects on the 11th day of April, 1899, and then resided in the Philippine Islands, and their children born subsequent thereto, shall be deemed and held to be citizens of the Philippine Islands and as such entitled to the protection of the United States, except such as shall have elected to preserve their allegiance to the Crown of Spain in accordance with the provisions of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain, entered into on the 11th day of April, 1899.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 5. That whenever the existing insurrection in the Philippine Islands shall have ceased and a condition of general and complete peace shall have been established therein, and the fact shall be certified to the President by the Philippine Commission, the President, upon being satisfied thereof, shall order a census of the Philippine Islands to be taken; such census in its inquiries relating to the population shall take and make, so far as practicable, full report for all the inhabitants, of name, age, sex, race, or tribe, whether native or foreign born, literacy in Spanish, native dialect or language, or in English, school attendance, and ownership of homes, and such other information separately for each island, each province, and municipality, or other civil division needful to inform the President and Congress concerning the capacity, fitness, and readiness of all the people of the Philippine Islands and of particular islands, provinces, and municipalities, and other civil divisions for the establishment and maintenance in the Philippine Islands or certain of them of a permanent popular representative government.

Mr. RAWLINS. I propose the amendment which I send to the desk to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah proposes an amendment to the amendment. The Chair will state to the Senator from Utah that, as he understands it, unanimous consent was given yesterday to proceed with the consideration of the committee amendments first.

Mr. RAWLINS. But this is an amendment to an amendment of the committee.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Utah is quite right. He is offering an amendment to the amendment of the committee, I understand.

Mr. RAWLINS. It is an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I suggest to the Senator, as the Senate is very thin at this moment, that we pass over these three amendments for the present and come back to them, if that course is agreeable to him.

Mr. RAWLINS. Very well. Let my amendment be read.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 5 of the bill by inserting after the word "homes," in line 18, the following words:

Also the number of deaths which have occurred in said islands since the 1st day of January, 1899, and the causes thereof, and the character and value of property destroyed since said date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, the pending amendment of the committee will be temporarily passed over.

Mr. LODGE. Sections 5, 6, and 7. They are all one amendment really. I ask that they be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be temporarily passed over.

The remaining part of the amendment passed over is to insert as additional sections the following:

SEC. 6. That after the report of such census the Philippine Commission shall fully report to the President and to Congress their recommendations based on such census and upon the operation of the local governments hereinafter provided for, whether or not all or certain of the Philippine Islands are capable, fit, and ready for the establishment of a permanent popular representative government.

SEC. 7. That the Philippine Commission meantime are hereby authorized and directed, in their discretion, to continue to establish additional municipal and provincial governments in the Philippine Islands with popular representative government so far and so fast as communities in such civil divisions are capable, fit, and ready for the same, the qualification of electors in elections in municipalities and provinces to be the same as now provided by law for electors in municipal elections; and said Philippine Commission whenever they find other male inhabitants of lawful age in such municipalities and provinces capable, fit, and ready for such extension shall include the same among the electors, with the purpose of gradually extending to municipalities and provinces permanent popular representative government.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Philippines was, in section 8, page 5, line 25, after the word "as," to insert "and whenever;" and on page 6, line 5, after the word "may," to strike out "think" and insert "deem;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. That the President of the United States, during such time as and whenever the sovereignty and authority of the United States encounter armed resistance in the Philippine Archipelago, and until otherwise provided by Congress, shall continue to regulate and control commercial intercourse with and within said archipelago by such general rules and regulations as he,

in his discretion, may deem most conducive to the public interests and the general welfare.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, page 6, line 11, after the word "thereto," to strike out "wharves, piers, warehouses, storehouses;" in line 12, before the word "light-houses," to insert "bonded warehouses;" and in line 14, after the word "including," to insert "bonded;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That the government of the Philippines is hereby authorized to provide for the needs of commerce by improving the harbors and navigable waters of the archipelago and to construct and maintain in said navigable waters and upon the shore adjacent thereto bonded warehouses, light-houses, signal stations, buoys, and like instruments of commerce, and to adopt and enforce regulations in regard thereto, including bonded warehouses wherein articles not intended to be imported into said islands nor mingled with the property therein, but brought into a port of the Philippines for reshipment to another country, may be deposited in bond and reshipped to another country without the payment of customs duties or charges.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, after the word "property," to insert "and rights;" in line 23, after the word "ninety-eight," to strike out—

In any lands devoted to public use, bridges, structures, water powers, highways, unnavigable streams, the beds of rivers, subterranean waters, mines, or minerals under the surface of private lands, and all property which, at the date of the treaty, belonged under the laws of Spain then in force to the various harbor works boards of the Philippine Islands, and all the harbor shores, docks, slips, and reclaimed lands, but not including harbor areas or navigable waters, except as hereinafter provided, and on page 7, line 8, after the word "islands," to insert "except as hereinafter provided;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. That all the property and rights which may have been acquired in the Philippine Islands by the United States under the treaty of peace with Spain, 1898, are hereby placed under the control of the government of the Philippine Islands to be administered for the benefit of the inhabitants of the islands, except as hereinafter provided.

Mr. RAWLINS. I suggest that we pass over the first amendment to section 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the request of the Senator from Utah section 10 will be temporarily passed over.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Philippines was, in section 12, page 8, line 1, after the word "lands," to insert "not exceeding 160 acres, or its equivalent in hectares;" in line 7, after the word "title," to strike out "The" and insert "and the;" in line 10, after the word "Islands," to strike out "or his heirs or assigns;" and in line 12, before the word "which," to insert "or its equivalent in hectares;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 12. That the government of the Philippine Islands is hereby authorized and empowered to enact rules and regulations and to prescribe terms and conditions to enable persons to perfect their title to public lands not exceeding 160 acres, or its equivalent in hectares, who, prior to the transfer of sovereignty from Spain to the United States, had fulfilled all or some of the conditions required by the Spanish laws and royal decrees of the Kingdom of Spain for the acquisition of legal title thereto yet failed to secure conveyance of title; and the President of the United States is authorized, upon the recommendation of the Philippine Commission, to issue patents, without compensation, to any native of the Philippine Islands, conveying title to any tract of land not more than 160 acres, or its equivalent in hectares, which had been actually occupied by such native or his ancestors prior to the 13th of August, 1898.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section (10) 13, page 8, line 15, after the word "That," to insert "pending the preparation and until the adoption of rules and regulations as provided in section 8;" in line 20, after the word "than," to strike out "ninety-nine" and insert "five;" and in line 24, after the word "acres," to insert "or its equivalent in hectares;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 13. That pending the preparation and until the adoption of rules and regulations as provided in section 8 the government of the Philippines is hereby authorized and empowered, on such terms as it may prescribe, to lease, let, and demise to actual occupants and settlers and others, for a term of not more than five years, such parts and portions of the public domain other than timber and mineral lands of the United States in the Philippine Islands as it may deem wise, not exceeding 160 acres, or its equivalent in hectares, to any one person, nor more than 5,000 acres to any corporation or association of persons.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section (11) 14, page 9, line 4, after the word "section," to insert "thirteen;" and in line 13, after the word "acres," to insert "or its equivalent in hectares;" and in line 18, after the word "first," to strike out "granted and," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 14. That in leasing, demising, or letting any part of the public domain, under the provisions of section 13, preference in all cases shall be given to actual occupants and settlers; and public lands of the United States in the actual possession or occupancy of any native of the Philippine Islands shall not be leased, let, or demised by said government to any other person without the consent thereto of said prior occupant or settler first had and obtained: Provided, That the prior right hereby secured to an occupant of land, who can show no other proof of title than possession, shall not apply to more than 160 acres or its equivalent in hectares in any one tract.

No lease or contract of letting made by virtue of this act shall be sold, assigned, or otherwise disposed of, nor shall the property leased be sublet without the consent of the Philippine government first given.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [12] 15, page 9, line 20, after the word "leased," to strike out "let;" in line 21, after the word sections," to insert "12, 13, and 14;" on page 10, line 1, after the word "moneys," to strike out "derived or;" in the same line, after the word "obtained," to strike out "by virtue of" and insert "from;" in line 2, before the word "of," to strike out "or contract of letting;" and in the same line, after the word "of," to strike out "any part or" and insert "any;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 15. That timber, trees, forests, and forest products on lands leased or demised by the Philippine government under sections 12, 13, and 14 shall not be cut, destroyed, removed, or appropriated except by special permission of said government and under such regulations as it may prescribe.

All moneys obtained from any lease of any portion of the public domain by the government of the Philippine Islands shall be covered into the insular treasury and be subject to appropriation for insular purposes according to law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. If I may interrupt the reading of the bill for a moment, I desire to ask my colleague, so that I may understand the bill as it goes on, whether the phrases "the government of the Philippines" and "the government of the Philippine Islands," where they occur, mean the government that is contemplated in the bill to be hereafter established, or does it include the present authorities in the Philippines?

Mr. LODGE. It contemplates simply the existing government.

Mr. HOAR. So that all these things provided to be done may be done by that government the day after the passage of the bill?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on the Philippines was, in section (13) 16, page 10, line 11, after the word "regulations," to strike out "now;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 16. That no timber lands forming part of the public domain shall be sold or leased by the government of the Philippines, but said government shall have the right, and is hereby empowered, to issue licenses to cut timber under the forestry regulations in force in the Philippine Islands, and may sell or lease land to any person or persons holding such licenses to cut timber sufficient for a mill site, and may grant rights of way to enable persons holding licenses to cut timber to get access to the lands where timber cutting is authorized.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. The next amendment proposed by the committee is to strike out sections 16 to 49, inclusive, beginning with line 4, on page 11, and ending with line 10, on page 34, in regard to the mining laws. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the original language, which the committee reported in favor of striking out, be dispensed with, and that simply the amendment reported by the committee, proposing to insert new sections, be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. RAWLINS. I think the entire text of the bill had better be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] insists that the sections proposed to be stricken out shall be read.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, if the Senator wants to have read the sections which the committee propose to strike out, that is all right.

Mr. RAWLINS. I think they ought to be read.

Mr. LODGE. I asked to have read simply the amendment prepared by the committee, inserting new sections in lieu of those stricken out. If the Senator wants to have read the old sections, which are proposed to be stricken out, of course, I have no objection.

Mr. RAWLINS. They may just as well be all read.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on the Philippines was to strike out sections 16 to 49, inclusive, beginning in line 4, on page 11, and ending in line 10, on page 34, as follows:

SEC. 16. That mining claims upon veins or lodes of quartz or other rock in place-bearing gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, tin, copper, or other valuable deposits, located after the passage of this act, whether located by one or more persons, may equal but shall not exceed 1,500 feet in length along the vein or lode, but no location of a mining claim shall be made until the discovery of the vein or lode within the limits of the claim located. No claim shall extend more than 300 feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface, nor shall any claim be limited by any mining regulation to less than 25 feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface, except where adverse rights existing on the date of the passage of this act render such limitation necessary. The end lines of each claim shall be parallel to each other.

SEC. 17. That proof of citizenship under this act may consist, in the case of an individual, of his own affidavit thereof; in the case of an association of persons unincorporated, of the affidavit of their authorized agent, made on his own knowledge or upon information and belief; and in the case of a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State or Territory thereof, or of the Philippine Islands, by the filing of a certified copy of their charter or certificate of incorporation.

SEC. 18. That the locators of all mining locations heretofore made or which shall hereafter be made on any mineral vein, lode, or ledge situated on the public domain, their heirs and assigns, where no adverse claim exists at the date of the passage of this act, so long as they comply with the laws of the United States, and with the laws and local regulations of the Philippine Islands not in conflict with the laws of the United States governing their possessory title, shall have the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all the surface included within the lines of their locations, and all veins, lodes, or ledges throughout their entire depth the top or apex of which lies inside of such surface lines extended downward vertically, although such veins, lodes, or ledges may so far depart from a perpendicular in their course downward as to extend outside the vertical side lines of such surface locations. But their right of possession to such outside parts of such veins or ledges shall be confined to such portions thereof as lie between vertical planes drawn downward as above described, through the end lines of their locations, so continued in their own direction that such planes will intersect such exterior parts of such veins or ledges: Provided, That in working a blanket ledge the locator or possessor of a mining claim shall be restricted to that portion of such ledge which lies inside of the surface lines of the claim extended downward vertically. And nothing in this section shall authorize the locator or possessor of a vein or lode which extends in its downward course beyond the vertical lines of his claim to enter upon the surface of a claim owned and possessed by another.

SEC. 19. That where a tunnel is run for the development of a vein or lode or for the discovery of mines the owners of such tunnel shall have the right of possession of all veins or lodes within 3,000 feet from the face of such tunnel on the line thereof, not previously known to exist, discovered in such tunnel, to the same extent as if discovered from the surface; and locations on the line of such tunnel of veins or lodes not appearing on the surface, made by other parties after the commencement of the tunnel and while the same is being prosecuted with reasonable diligence, shall be invalid; but failure to prosecute the work on the tunnel for six months shall be considered as an abandonment of the right to all undiscovered veins on the line of such tunnel.

SEC. 20. That the United States Philippine Commission or its successors may make regulations, not in conflict with the provisions of this act, governing the location, manner of recording, and amount of work necessary to hold possession of a mining claim, subject to the following requirements: The location must be distinctly marked on the ground, so that its boundaries can be readily traced. All records of mining claims hereafter made shall contain the name or names of locators, the date of location, and such a description of the claim or claims located, by reference to some natural object or permanent monument, as will identify the claim. On each claim located after the passage of this act, and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year: Provided, That where a person or company has or may run a tunnel for the purpose of developing a lode or lodes owned by said person or company the money so expended in said tunnel shall be taken and considered as expended on said lode or lodes; and such person or company shall not be required to perform work on the surface of said lode or lodes in order to hold the same.

Where such claims are held in common such expenditure may be made upon any one claim; and upon a failure to comply with these conditions the claim or mine upon which such failure occurred shall be open to relocation in the same manner as if no location of the same had ever been made, provided that the original locators, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives have not resumed work upon the claim after failure and before such location. Upon the failure of any one of several coowners to contribute his proportion of the expenditures required thereby, the coowners who have performed the labor or made the improvements may, at the expiration of the year, give such delinquent coowner personal notice in writing, or notice by publication in the newspaper published nearest the claim, and in two newspapers published at Manila, one in the English language and the other in the Spanish language, to be designated by the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands, for at least once a week for ninety days, and if, at the expiration of ninety days after such notice in writing or by publication such delinquent shall fail or refuse to contribute his proportion of the expenditure required by this section his interest in the claim shall become the property of his coowners who have made the required expenditures. The period within which the work required to be done annually on all unpatented mineral claims shall commence on the 1st day of January succeeding the date of location of such claim.

SEC. 21. That a patent for any land claimed and located for valuable mineral deposits may be obtained in the following manner: Any person, association, or corporation authorized to locate a claim under this act, having claimed and located a piece of land for such purposes, who has or have complied with the terms of this act, may file in the office of the provincial secretary of the province wherein the land claimed is located, or, if there is no provincial secretary, in the office of the adjutant-general of the commander of the military department wherein such land is located, an application for a patent, under oath, showing such compliance, together with a plat and field notes of the claim or claims in common, made by or under the direction of the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands, showing accurately the boundaries of the claim or claims, which shall be distinctly marked by monuments on the ground, and shall post a copy of such plat, together with a notice of such application for a patent, in a conspicuous place on the land embraced in such plat previous to the filing of the application for a patent, and shall file an affidavit of at least two persons that such notice has been duly posted, and shall file a copy of the notice in such office, and shall thereupon be entitled to a patent for the land, in the manner following: The provincial secretary or adjutant-general, upon the filing of such application, plat, field notes, notices, and affidavits, shall publish a notice that such an application has been made, once a week for the period of sixty days, in a newspaper to be by him designated as nearest to such claim and in two newspapers published at Manila, one in the English language and one in the Spanish language, to be designated by the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands, and he shall also post such notice in his office for the same period.

The claimant at the time of filing this application, or at any time thereafter within the sixty days of publication, shall file with the provincial secretary or adjutant-general a certificate of the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands that $500 worth of labor has been expended or improvements made upon the claim by himself or grantors; that the plat is correct, with such further description by such reference to natural objects or permanent monuments as shall identify the claim, and furnish an accurate description to be incorporated in the patent. At the expiration of the sixty days of publication the claimant shall file his affidavit, showing that the plat and notice have been posted in a conspicuous place on the claim during such period of publication. If no adverse claim shall have been filed with the provincial secretary or adjutant-general at the expiration of the sixty days of publication, it shall be assumed that the applicant is entitled to a patent upon the payment to the provincial treasurer or the collector of internal revenue of $5 per acre and that no adverse claim exists, and thereafter no objection from third parties to the issuance of a patent shall be heard, except it be shown that the applicant has failed to comply with the terms of this act: Provided, That where the claimant for a patent is not a resident of or within the province or military department wherein the vein, ledge, or deposit sought to be patented is located, the application for patent and the affidavits required to be made in this section by the claimant for such patent may be made by his, her, or its authorized agent where said agent is conversant with the facts sought to be established by said affidavits.

SEC. 22. That applicants for mineral patents, if residing beyond the limits of the province or military department wherein the claim is situated, may make any oath or affidavit required for proof of citizenship before the clerk of any court of record or before any notary public of any province or military department of the Philippine Islands or any other official authorized by law to administer oaths.

SEC. 23. That where an adverse claim is filed during the period of publication it shall be upon oath of the person or persons making the same, and shall show the nature, boundaries, and extent of such adverse claim, and all proceedings, except the publication of notice and making and filing of the affidavits thereof, shall be stayed until the controversy shall have been settled or decided by a court of competent jurisdiction, or the adverse claim waived. It shall be the duty of the adverse claimant, within thirty days after filing his claim, to commence proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction to determine the question of the right of possession, and prosecute the same with reasonable diligence to final judgment; and a failure so to do shall be a waiver of his adverse claim.

After such judgment shall have been rendered the party entitled to the possession of the claim, or any portion thereof, may, without giving further notice, file a certified copy of the judgment roll with the provincial secretary or adjutant-general of the commander of the military department, as the case may be, together with the certificate of the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands that the requisite amount of labor has been expended or improvements made thereon, and the description required in other cases, and shall pay to the provincial treasurer or the collector of internal revenue of the province in which the claim is situated, as the case may be, $5 per acre for his claim, together with the proper fees, whereupon the whole proceedings and the judgment roll shall be certified by the provincial secretary or adjutant-general of the commander of the military department, as the case may be, to the secretary of the interior of the Philippine Islands, and a patent shall issue thereon for the claim, or such portion thereof as the applicant shall appear, from the decision of the court, rightly to possess. The adverse claim may be verified by the oath of any duly authorized agent or attorney in fact of the adverse claimant cognizant of the facts stated; and the adverse claimant, if residing or at the time being beyond the limits of the province or military department wherein the claim is situated, may make oath to the adverse claim before the clerk of any court of record or any notary public of any province or military department of the Philippine Islands, or any other officer authorized to administer oaths where the adverse claimant may then be.

If it appears from the decision of the court that several parties are entitled to separate and different portions of the claim, each party may pay for his portion of the claim, with the proper fees, and file the certificate and description by the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands, whereupon the provincial secretary or adjutant-general of the commander of the military department, as the case may be, shall certify the proceedings and judgment roll to the secretary of the interior for the Philippine Islands, as in the preceding case, and patents shall issue to the several parties according to their respective rights. If in any action brought pursuant to this section title to the ground in controversy shall not be established by either party, the court shall so find, and judgment shall be entered accordingly. In such case costs shall not be allowed to either party, and the claimant shall not proceed in the office of the provincial secretary or adjutant-general of the commander of the military department, as the case may be, or be entitled to a patent for the ground in controversy until he shall have perfected his title. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the alienation of a title conveyed by a patent for a mining claim to any person whatever.

SEC. 24. That the description of vein or lode claims upon unsurveyed lands shall designate the location of the claim with reference to the lines of the public surveys, but need not conform therewith; but where a patent shall be issued for claims upon unsurveyed lands the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands in extending the surveys shall adjust the same to the boundaries of such patented claim according to the plat or description thereof, but so as in no case to interfere with or change the location of any such patented claim.

SEC. 25. That claims usually called "placers," including all forms of deposits, excepting veins of quartz or other rock in place, shall be subject to entry and patent, under like circumstances and conditions and upon similar proceedings as are provided for vein or lode claims; but where the lands have been previously surveyed by governmental authority the entry in its exterior limits shall conform to the legal subdivisions of the public lands.

SEC. 26. That any person authorized to enter lands under this act may enter and obtain patent to lands that are chiefly valuable for building stone under the provisions of this act relative to placer mineral claims.

SEC. 27. That any person authorized to enter lands under this act may enter and obtain patent to lands containing petroleum or other mineral oils and chiefly valuable therefor under the provisions of this act relative to placer mineral claims.

SEC. 28. That no location of a placer claim shall exceed 160 acres for any association of persons, irrespective of the number of persons composing such association, and no such location shall include more than 20 acres for an individual claimant. Such locations shall conform to the laws of the United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, with reference to public surveys, and nothing in this section contained shall defeat or impair any bona fide ownership of land for agricultural purposes or authorize the sale of the improvements of any bona fide settler to any purchaser.

SEC. 29. That where placer claims are upon surveyed lands and conform to legal subdivisions, no further survey or plat shall be required, and all placer mining claims located after the date of passage of this act shall conform as nearly as practicable with the Philippine system of public land surveys and the regular subdivisions of such surveys; but where placer claims can not be conformed to legal subdivisions, survey and plat shall be made as on surveyed lands; and where by the segregation of mineral lands in any legal subdivision a quantity of agricultural land less than 40 acres shall remain, such fractional portion of agricultural land may be entered by any party qualified by law for homestead purposes.

SEC. 30. That where such person or association, they and their grantors, have held and worked their claims for a period equal to the time prescribed by the statute of limitations of the Philippine Islands, evidence of such possession and working of the claims for such period shall be sufficient to establish a right to a patent thereto under this act, in the absence of any adverse claim; but nothing in this act shall be deemed to impair any lien which may have attached in any way whatever to the issuance of a patent.

SEC. 31. That where the same person, association, or corporation is in possession of a placer claim, and also a vein or lode included within the boundaries thereof, application shall be made for a patent for the placer claim, with the statement that it includes such vein or lode, and in such case a patent shall issue for the placer claim, subject to the provisions of this act, including such vein or lode and 25 feet of surface on each side thereof, upon the payment of $5 per acre for such vein or lode claim. The remainder of the placer claim, or any placer claim not embracing any vein or lode claim, shall be paid for at the rate of $2.50 per acre, together with all costs and proceedings; and where a vein or lode such as is described in section 3 is known to exist within the boundaries of a placer claim an application for a patent for such placer claim which does not include an application for the vein or lode claim shall be construed a conclusive declaration that the claimant of the placer claim has no right of possession of the vein or lode claim, but where the existence of a vein or lode in a placer claim is not known a patent for the placer claim shall convey all valuable mineral or other deposits within the boundaries thereof.

SEC. 32. That the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands may appoint as many competent deputy mineral surveyors as shall apply for appointment to survey mining claims. The expenses of the survey of vein or lode claims and of the survey of placer claims, together with the cost of publication of notices, shall be paid by the applicants, and they shall be at liberty to obtain the same at the most reasonable rates, and they shall also be at liberty to employ any deputy mineral surveyor to make the survey. The chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands shall also have power to establish the maximum charges for surveys and publication of notices under this act; and in case of excessive charges for publication he may designate any newspaper published in a province or military department where mines are situated, or in Manila, for the publication of mining notices and fix the rates to be charged by such paper; and to the end that the chief of the bureau of public lands may be fully informed on the subject, such applicant shall file with the provincial secretary or adjutant-general, as the case may be, a sworn statement of all charges and fees paid by such applicant for publication and surveys, and of all fees and money paid the provincial treasurer or the collector of internal revenue, as the case may be, which statement shall be transmitted, with the other papers in the case, to the secretary of the interior for the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 33. That all affidavits required to be made under this act may be verified before any officer authorized to administer oaths within the province or military department where the claims may be situated, and all testimony and proofs may be taken before any such officer, and, when duly certified by the officer taking the same, shall have the same force and effect as if taken before the proper provincial secretary or adjutant-general. In cases of contest as to the mineral or agricultural character of land the testimony and proofs may be taken as herein provided on personal notice of at least ten days to the opposing party; or if such party can not be found, then by publication at least once a week for thirty days in a newspaper to be designated by the provincial secretary or the adjutant-general of the military department, as the case may be, published nearest to the location of such land and in two newspapers published at Manila, one in the English language and one in the Spanish language, to be designated by the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands; and the provincial secretary or adjutant-general of the military department shall require proofs that such notice has been given.

SEC. 34. That when two or more veins intersect or cross each other, priority of title shall govern and such prior location shall be entitled to all ore or mineral contained within the space of intersection; but the subsequent location shall have the right of way through the space of intersection for the purposes of the convenient working of the mine, and where two or more veins unite, the oldest or prior location shall take the vein below the point of union, including all the space of intersection.

SEC. 35. That where nonmineral land not contiguous to the vein or lode is used or occupied by the proprietor of such vein or lode for mining or milling purposes, such nonadjacent surface ground may be embraced and included in an application for a patent for such vein or lode, and the same may be patented therewith, subject to the same preliminary requirements as to survey and notice as are applicable to veins or lodes; but no location of such nonadjacent land shall exceed 5 acres, and payment for the same must be made at the same rate as fixed by this act for the superficies of the lode. The owner of a quartz mill or reduction works not owning a mine in connection therewith may also receive a patent for his mill site as provided in this section.

SEC. 36. That as a condition of sale the United States Philippine Commission or its successors may provide rules for working, policing, and sanitation of mines, and rules concerning easements, drainage, water rights, right of way, right of Government survey and inspection, and other necessary means to their complete development not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, and those conditions shall be fully expressed in the patent. The Commission is hereby further empowered to fix the bonds of deputy mineral surveyors.

SEC. 37. That whenever by priority of possession rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes have vested and accrued and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same, and the right of way for the construction of ditches and canals for the purposes herein specified is acknowledged and confirmed, but whenever any person, in the construction of any ditch or canal, injures or damages the possession of any settler on the public domain, the party committing such injury or damage shall be liable to the party injured for such injury or damage.

SEC. 38. That all patents granted shall be subject to any vested and accrued water rights, or rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water rights as may have been acquired under or recognized by the preceding section.

SEC. 39. That the United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, are authorized to establish land districts and provide for the appointment of the necessary officers wherever they may deem the same necessary for the public convenience, and to further provide that in districts where land officers are established proceedings required by this act to be had before provincial or military officers shall be had before the proper officers of such land offices.

SEC. 40. That every person above the age of 21 years, who is a citizen of the United States, a native of the Philippine Islands, or who has acquired the rights of a native of the Philippine Islands under and by virtue of the treaty of Paris, or any association of persons severally qualified as above, shall, upon application to the proper provincial treasurer or adjutant-general, have the right to enter any quantity of vacant coal lands of the Philippine Islands not otherwise appropriated or reserved by competent authority, not exceeding 160 acres to such individual person, or 320 acres to such association, upon payment to the provincial treasurer or the collector of internal revenue, as the case may be, of not less than $10 per acre for such lands, where the same shall be situated more than 15 miles from any completed railroad or available harbor or navigable stream, and not less than $20 per acre for such lands as shall be within 15 miles of such road, harbor, or stream: Provided, That such entries shall be taken in squares of 40 or 160 acres, in conformity with the rules and regulations governing the public land surveys of the United States in plotting legal subdivisions.

SEC. 41. That any person or association of persons severally qualified as above provided, who have opened and improved, or shall hereafter open and improve, any coal mine or mines upon the public lands, and shall be in actual possession of the same, shall be entitled to a preference right of entry under the preceding section of the mines so opened and improved: Provided, That when any association of not less than four persons, severally qualified as above provided, shall have expended not less than $5,000 in working and improving any such mine or mines, such association may enter not exceeding 640 acres, including such mining improvements.

SEC. 42. That all claims under the preceding section must be presented to the proper provincial secretary or adjutant-general within sixty days after the date of actual possession and the commencement of improvements on the land by the filing of a declaratory statement therefor; and where the improvements shall have been made prior to the expiration of three months from the date of the passage of this act, sixty days from the expiration of such three months shall be allowed for the filing of a declaratory statement, and no sale under the provisions of this act shall be allowed until the expiration of six months from the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 43. That the three preceding sections shall be held to authorize only one entry by the same person or association of persons, and no association of persons, any members of which shall have taken the benefit of such sections, either as an individual or as a member of any other association, shall enter or hold any other lands under the provisions thereof, and no member of any association which shall have taken the benefit of such sections shall enter or hold any other lands under their provisions; and all persons claiming under section 28 shall be required to prove their respective rights and pay for the lands filed upon within one year from the time prescribed for filing their respective claims; and upon failure to file the proper notice or to pay for the land within the required period, the same shall be subject to entry by any other qualified applicant.

SEC. 44. That in case of conflicting claims upon coal lands, where the improvements shall be commenced after the date of the passage of this act, priority of possession and improvement, followed by proper filing and continued good faith, shall determine the preference right to purchase. And also where improvements have already been made prior to the passage of this act, division of the land claimed may be made by legal subdivisions, which shall conform as nearly as practicable with the subdivisions of land under the United States system of public land surveys, to include as near as may be the valuable improvements of the respective parties. The United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, are authorized to issue all needful rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this and preceding sections.

SEC. 45. That whenever it shall be made to appear to the secretary of any province in the Philippine Islands, or if there is no provincial secretary, to the adjutant-general of the commander of the military department including any province, that any lands within the province or department are saline in character, it shall be the duty of said provincial secretary or adjutant-general, under the regulations of the United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, to take testimony in reference to such lands, to ascertain their true character, and to report the same to the secretary of the interior for the Philippine Islands; and if, upon such testimony, the secretary of the interior shall find that such lands are saline and incapable of being purchased under any of the laws relative to the public domain, then and in such case said lands shall be offered for sale at the office of the provincial secretary or adjutant-general of the province or department in which the same shall be situated, as the case may be, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, and sold to the highest bidder, for cash, at a price of not less than $1.20 per acre; and in case such lands fail to sell when so offered, then the same shall be subject to private sale at such office, for cash, at a price not less than $1.20 per acre, in the same manner as other lands in the Philippine Islands are sold. All Executive proclamations relating to the sales of public saline lands shall be published in only two newspapers, one printed in the English language and one in the Spanish language, at Manila, which shall be designated by the secretary of the interior.

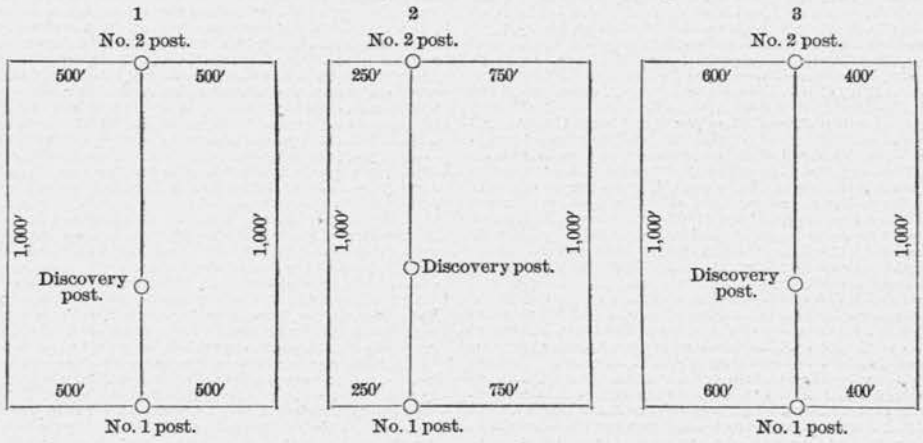
SEC. 46. That no act granting lands to provinces or corporations to aidi the construction of roads, or for other purposes, shall be so construed as to embrace mineral lands, which in all cases are reserved exclusively, unless otherwise specially provided in the act or acts making the grant.

SEC. 47. That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the rights of any person, partnership, or corporation having a valid, perfected mining concession granted prior to April 11, 1899, but all such concessions shall be conducted under the provisions of the law in force at the time they were granted, subject at all times to cancellation by reason of illegality in the procedure by which they were obtained, or for failure to comply with the conditions prescribed as requisite to their retention in the laws under which they were granted: Provided, That the owner or owners of every such concession shall cause the corners made by its boundaries to be distinctly marked with permanent monuments within ninety days after this act has been promulgated in the Philippine Islands, and that any concessions the boundaries of which are not so marked within this period shall be free and open to explorations and purchase under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 48. That mining rights on public lands in the Philippine Islands shall, after the passage of this act, be required only in accordance with its provisions.

SEC. 49. That the United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, are hereby empowered to establish a mining bureau, which shall discharge the duties prescribed for the "inspeccion de minas" by the laws in force in the Philippine Islands prior to April 11, 1899, with reference to all perfected Spanish concessions, and shall discharge such further duties, not in conflict with the provisions of this act, with reference to the mineral wealth and the development of the mining industry in the Philippine Islands, as the United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, may provide: Provided, That all proceedings for the cancellation of perfected Spanish concessions shall be conducted in the courts of the Philippine Islands having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, unless the United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, shall create special tribunals for the determination of such controversies.

And in lieu thereof to insert:



SEC. 19. That mining claims upon veins or lodes of quartz or other rock in place bearing gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, tin, copper, or other valuable deposits, located after the passage of this act, whether located by one or more persons qualified to locate the same under section 14, to be located in the following manner and under the following conditions: Any person so qualified desiring to locate a mineral claim, shall, subject to the provisions of this act with respect to land which may be used for mining, enter upon the same and locate a plot of ground measuring, where possible but not exceeding, 1,000 feet in length by 1,000 feet in breadth, in as nearly as possible a rectangular form—that is to say: All angles shall be right angles, except in cases where a boundary line of a previously surveyed claim is adopted as common to both claims, but the lines need not necessarily be meridional. In defining the size of a mineral claim, it shall be measured horizontally, irrespective of inequalities of the surface of the ground.

SEC. 20. That a mineral claim shall be marked by two posts placed as nearly as possible on the line of the ledge or vein, and the posts shall be numbered 1 and 2, and the distance between posts numbered 1 and 2 shall not exceed 1,000 feet, the line between posts numbered 1 and 2 to be known as the location line; and upon posts numbered 1 and 2 shall be written the name given to the mineral claim, the name of the locator, and the date of the location. Upon post numbered 1 there shall be written, in addition to the foregoing, "Initial post," the approximate compass bearing of post numbered 2, and a statement of the number of feet lying to the right and to the left of the line from post numbered 1 to post numbered 2, thus: "Initial post. Direction of post numbered 2. ——feet of this claim lie on the right and——feet on the left of the line from No. 1 to No. 2 post." All the particulars required to be put on No. 1 and No. 2 posts shall be furnished by the locator to the provincial secretary or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder, in writing, at the time the claim is recorded, and shall form a part of the record of such claim.

SEC. 21. That when a claim has been located the holder shall immediately mark the line between posts numbered 1 and 2 so that it can be distinctly seen. The locator shall also place a post at the point where he has found rock in place, on which shall be written "Discovery post:" Provided, That when the claim is surveyed the surveyor shall be guided by the records of the claim, the sketch plan on the back of the declaration made by the owner when the claim was recorded, posts numbered 1 and 2, and the notice on No. 1, the initial post.

EXAMPLES OF VARIOUS MODES OF LAYING OUT CLAIMS.

SEC. 22. That it shall not be lawful to move No. 1 post, but No. 2 post may be moved by the deputy mineral surveyor when the distance between posts Nos. 1 and 2 exceeds 1,000 feet, in order to place No. 2 post 1,000 feet from No. 1 post on the line of location. When the distance between posts Nos. 1 and 2 is less than 1,000 feet the deputy mineral surveyor shall have no authority to extend the claim beyond No. 2.

SEC. 23. That the "location line" shall govern the direction of one side of the claim, upon which the survey shall be extended according to this act.

SEC. 24. That the holder of a mineral claim shall be entitled to all minerals which may lie within his claim, but he shall not be entitled to mine outside the boundary lines of his claim continued vertically downward: Provided, That this act shall not prejudice the rights of claim owners nor claim holders whose claims have been located under existing laws prior to this act.

SEC. 25. That no mineral claim of the full size shall be recorded without the application being accompanied by an affidavit made by the applicant or some person on his behalf cognizant of the facts—that the legal notices and posts have been put up; that mineral has been found in place on the claim proposed to be recorded; that the ground applied for is unoccupied by any other person as a mineral claim, and is not occupied by any building, or any land falling within the curtilage of any dwelling house, or any land under cultivation. In the said declaration shall be set out the name of the applicant and the date of the location of the claim. The words written on the No. 1 and No. 2 posts shall be set out in full, and as accurate a description as possible of the position of the claim given with reference to some natural object or permanent monuments.

SEC. 26. That no mineral claim which at the date of its record is known by the locator to be less than a full-sized mineral claim shall be recorded without the word "fraction" being added to the name of the claim, and the application being accompanied by an affidavit or solemn declaration made by the applicant or some person on his behalf cognizant of the facts: That the legal posts and notices have been put up; that mineral has been found in place on the fractional claim proposed to be recorded; that the ground applied for is unoccupied by any other person as a mineral claim, and is not occupied by any building, or any land falling within the curtilage of any dwelling house, or any land under cultivation. In the said declaration shall be set out the name of the applicant and the date of the location of the claim. The words written on the posts Nos. 1 and 2 shall be set out in full, and as accurate a description as possible of the position of the claim given. A sketch plan shall be drawn by the applicant on the back of the declaration, showing as near as may be the position of the adjoining mineral claims, and the shape and size, expressed in feet, of the fraction desired to be recorded: Provided, That the failure on the part of the locator of a mineral claim to comply with any of the foregoing provisions of this section shall not be deemed to invalidate such location, if upon the facts it shall appear that such locator has actually discovered mineral in place on said location, and that there has been on his part a bona fide attempt to comply with the provisions of this act, and that the nonobservance of the formalities hereinbefore referred to is not of a character calculated to mislead other persons desiring to locate claims in the vicinity.

SEC. 27. That in cases where, from the nature or shape of the ground, it is impossible to mark the location line of the claim, as provided by this act, then the claim may be marked by placing posts as nearly as possible to the location line, and noting the distance and direction such posts may be from such location line, which distance and direction shall be set out in the record of the claim.

SEC. 28. That every person locating a mineral claim shall record the same with the provincial secretary or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder of the district within which the same is situate, within thirty days after the location thereof. Such record shall be made in a book to be kept for the purpose in the office of the said provincial secretary or such other officer as by the Philippine government described as mining recorder, in which shall be inserted the name of the claim, the name of each locator, the locality of the mine, the direction of the location line, the length in feet, the date of location, and the date of the record. A claim which shall not have been recorded within the prescribed period shall be deemed to have been abandoned.

SEC. 29. That every grant hereafter issued of a mineral claim shall convey, and be deemed to convey, only the right to the use and possession of the surface of such claim, including the use of all the timber thereon, for the purpose of getting from and out of such claim the minerals contained therein, including all operations connected therewith or with the business of mining; and the lawful holder by record of a claim shall, during the continuance of his record, be entitled to the same surface rights and no others; and all remaining surface rights shall be deemed to be vested in the Government and may be granted and disposed of as is provided by law, subject always to the rights of locators as aforesaid.

SEC. 30. That in case of any dispute as to the location of a mineral claim the title to the claim shall be recognized according to the priority of such location, subject to any question as to the validity of the record itself, and subject to the holder having complied with all the terms and conditions of this act.

SEC. 31. That no holder shall be entitled to hold in his own name, or in the name of any other person, more than one mineral claim on the same vein or lode.

SEC. 32. That a holder may at any any time abandon any mineral claim by giving notice, in writing, of such intention to abandon, to the provincial secretary or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder; and from the date of the record of such notice all his interest in such claim shall cease.

SEC. 33. That proof of citizenship under this act may consist, in the case of an individual, of his own affidavit thereof; in the case of an association of persons unincorporated, of the affidavit of their authorized agent, made on his own knowledge or upon information and belief; and in the case of a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State or Territory thereof, or of the Philippine Islands, by the filing of a certified copy of their charter or certificate of incorporation.

SEC. 34. That where a tunnel is run for the development of a vein or lode, or for the discovery of mines, the owners of such tunnel shall have the right of possession of all veins or lodes within 3,000 feet from the face of such tunnel on the line thereof, not previously known to exist, discovered in such tunnel, to the same extent as if discovered from the surface; and locations on the line of such tunnel, of veins or lodes not appearing on the surface, made by other parties after the commencement of the tunnel and while the same is being prosecuted with reasonable diligence, shall be invalid; but failure to prosecute the work on the tunnel for six months shall be considered as an abandonment of the right to all undiscovered veins on the line of such tunnel.

SEC. 35. That the United States Philippine Commission or its successors may make regulations, not in conflict with the provisions of this act, governing the location, manner of recording, and amount of work necessary to hold possession of a mining claim, subject to the following requirements:

On each claim located after the passage of this act, and until a patent has been issued therefore, not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year: Provided, That where a person or company has or may run a tunnel for the purpose of developing a lode or lodes owned by said person or company the money so expended in said tunnel shall be taken and considered as expended on said lode or lodes, and such person or company shall not be required to perform work on the surface of said lode or lodes in order to hold the same. Upon a failure to comply with these conditions the claim or mine upon which such failure occurred shall be open to relocation in the same manner as if no location of the same had ever been made, provided that the original locators, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives have not resumed work upon the claim after failure and before such location. Upon the failure of any one of several coowners to contribute his proportion of the expenditures required thereby, the coowners who have performed the labor or made the improvements may, at the expiration of the year, give such delinquent coowner personal notice in writing, or notice by publication in the newspaper published nearest the claim, and in two newspapers published at Manila, one in the English language and the other in the Spanish language, to be designated by the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands, for at least once a week for ninety days, and if, at the expiration of ninety days after such notice in writing or by publication such delinquent shall fail or refuse to contribute his proportion of the expenditure required by this section his interest in the claim shall become the property of his coowners who have made the required expenditures. The period within which the work required to be done annually on all unpatented mineral claims shall commence on the 1st day of January succeeding the date of location of such claim.

SEC. 36. That a patent for any land claimed or located for valuable mineral deposits may be obtained in the following manner: Any person, association, or corporation authorized to locate a claim under this act, having claimed and located a piece of land for such purposes, who has or have complied with the terms of this act, may file in the office of the provincial secretary, or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder of the province wherein the land claimed is located, an application for a patent, under oath, showing such compliance, together with a plat and field notes of the claim or claims in common, made by or under the direction of the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands, showing accurately the boundaries of the claim, which shall be distinctly marked by monuments on the ground, and shall post a copy of such plat, together with a notice of such application for a patent, in a conspicuous place on the land embraced in such plat previous to the filing of the application for a patent, and shall file an affidavit of at least two persons that such notice has been duly posted, and shall file a copy of the notice in such office, and shall thereupon be entitled to a patent for the land, in the manner following: The provincial secretary, or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder, upon the filing of such application, plat, field notes, notices, and affidavits, shall publish a notice that such an application has been made, once a week for the period of sixty days, in a newspaper to be by him designated as nearest to such claim and in two newspapers published at Manila, one in the English language and one in the Spanish language, to be designated by the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands; and he shall also post such notice in his office for the same period.

The claimant at the time of filing this application, or at any time thereafter within the sixty days of publication, shall file with the provincial secretary or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder a certificate of the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands that $500 worth of labor has been expended or improvements made upon the claim by himself or grantors; that the plat is correct, with such further description by such reference to natural objects or permanent monuments as shall identify the claim, and furnish an accurate description to be incorporated in the patent. At the expiration of the sixty days of publication the claimant shall file his affidavit, showing that the plat and notice have been posted in a conspicuous place on the claim during such period of publication. If no adverse claim shall have been filed with the provincial secretary or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder at the expiration of the sixty days of publication, it shall be assumed that the applicant is entitled to a patent upon the payment to the provincial treasurer or the collector of internal revenue of $5 per acre and that no adverse claim exists, and thereafter no objection from third parties to the issuance of a patent shall be heard, except it be shown that the applicant has failed to comply with the terms of this act: Provided, That where the claimant for a patent is not a resident of or within the province wherein the vein, ledge, or deposit sought to be patented is located, the application for patent and the affidavits required to be made in this section by the claimant for such patent may be made by his, her, or its authorized agent where said agent is conversant with the facts sought to be established by said affidavits.

SEC. 37. That applicants for mineral patents, if residing beyond the limits of the province or military department wherein the claim is situated, may make any oath or affidavit required for proof of citizenship before the clerk of any court of record or before any notary public of any province of the Philippine Islands or any other official authorized by law to administer oaths.

SEC. 38. That where an adverse claim is filed during the period of publication it shall be upon oath of the person or persons making the same, and shall show the nature, boundaries, and extent of such adverse claim, and all proceedings, except the publication of notice and making and filing of the affidavits thereof, shall be stayed until the controversy shall have been settled or decided by a court of competent jurisdiction, or the adverse claim waived. It shall be the duty of the adverse claimant, within thirty days after filing his claim, to commence proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction to determine the question of the right of possession, and prosecute the same with reasonable diligence to final judgment; and a failure so to do shall be a waiver of his adverse claim.

After such judgment shall have been rendered the party entitled to the possession of the claim, or any portion thereof, may, without giving further notice, file a certified copy of the judgment roll with the provincial secretary, or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder, together with the certificate of the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands that the requisite amount of labor has been expended or improvements made thereon, and the description required in other cases, and shall pay to the provincial treasurer or the collector of internal revenue of the province in which the claim is situated, as the case may be, $5 per acre for his claim, together with the proper fees, whereupon the whole proceedings and the judgment roll shall be certified by the provincial secretary, or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder, to the secretary of the interior of the Philippine Islands, and a patent shall issue thereon for the claim, or such portion thereof as the applicant shall appear, from the decision of the court, rightly to possess.

The adverse claim may be verified by the oath of any duly authorized agent or attorney in fact of the adverse claimant cognizant of the facts stated; and the adverse claimant, if residing or at the time being beyond the limits of the province wherein the claim is situated, may make oath to the adverse claim before the clerk of any court of record or any notary public of any province of the Philippine Islands, or any other officer authorized to administer oaths where the adverse claimant may then be. If it appears from the decision of the court that several parties are entitled to separate and different portions of the claim, each party may pay for his portion of the claim, with the proper fees, and file the certificate and description by the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands, whereupon the provincial secretary, or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder, shall certify the proceedings and judgment roll to the secretary of the interior for the Philippine Islands, as in the preceding case, and patents shall issue to the several parties according to their respective rights. If in any action brought pursuant to this section title to the ground in controversy shall not be established by either party, the court shall so find, and judgment shall be entered accordingly. In such case costs shall not be allowed to either party, and the claimant shall not proceed in the office of the provincial secretary, or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder, or be entitled to a patent for the ground in controversy until he shall have perfected his title. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the alienation of a title conveyed by a patent for a mining claim to any person whatever.

SEC. 39. That the description of vein or lode claims upon unsurveyed lands shall designate the location of the claim with reference to the lines of the public surveys, but need not conform therewith; but where a patent shall be issued for claims upon unsurveyed lands the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands in extending the surveys shall adjust the same to the boundaries of such patented claim according to the plat or description thereof, but so as is no case to interfere with or change the location of any such patented claim.

SEC. 40. That claims usually called "placer," including all forms of deposits excepting veins of quartz or other rock in place, shall be subject to entry and patent, under like circumstances and conditions and upon similar proceedings as are provided for vein or lode claims; but where the lands have been previously surveyed by governmental authority the entry in its exterior limits shall conform to the legal subdivisions of the public lands.

SEC. 41. That any person authorized to enter lands under this act may enter and obtain patent to lands that are chiefly valuable for building stone under the provisions of this act relative to placer mineral claims.

SEC. 42. That any person authorized to enter lands under this act may enter and obtain patent to lands containing petroleum or other mineral oils and chiefly valuable therefor, under the provisions of this act relative to placer mineral claims.

SEC. 43. That no location of a placer claim shall exceed 160 acres for any association of persons, irrespective of the number of persons composing such association, and no such location shall include more than 20 acres for an individual claimant. Such locations shall conform to the laws of the United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, with reference to public surveys, and nothing in this section contained shall defeat or impair any bona fide ownership of land for agricultural purposes or authorize the sale of the improvements of any bona fide settler to any purchaser.

SEC. 44. That where placer claims are upon surveyed lands and conform to legal subdivisions, no further survey or plat shall be required, and all placer mining claims located after the date of passage of this act shall conform as nearly as practicable with the Philippine system of public-land surveys and the regular subdivisions of such surveys; but where placer claims can not be conformed to legal subdivisions, survey and plat shall be made as on unsurveyed lands; and where by the segregation of mineral lands in any legal subdivision a quantity of agricultural land less than 40 acres shall remain, such fractional portion of agricultural land may be entered by any party qualified by law for homestead purposes.

SEC. 45. That where such person, association, and their grantors have held and worked their claims for a period equal to the time prescribed by the statute of limitations of the Philippine Islands, evidence of such possession and working of the claims for such period shall be sufficient to establish a right to a patent thereto under this act, in the absence of any adverse claim; but nothing in this act shall be deemed to impair any lien which may have attached in any way whatever prior to the issuance of a patent.

SEC. 46. That where the same person, association, or corporation is in possession of a placer claim, and also a vein or lode included within the boundaries thereof, application shall be made for a patent for the placer claim, with the statement that it includes such vein or lode, and in such case a patent shall issue for the placer claim, subject to the provisions of this act, including such vein or lode and 25 feet of surface on each side thereof, upon the payment of $5 per acre for such vein or lode claim. The remainder of the placer claim, or any placer claim not embracing any vein or lode claim, shall be paid for at the rate of $2.50 per acre, together with all costs of proceedings; and where a vein or lode such as is hereinbefore described is known to exist within the boundaries of a placer claim, an application for a patent for such placer claim which does not include an application for the vein or lode claim shall be construed as a conclusive declaration that the claimant of the placer claim has no right of possession of the vein or lode claim, but where the existence of a vein or lode in a placer claim is not known, a patent for the placer claim shall convey all valuable mineral or other deposits within the boundaries thereof.

SEC. 47. That the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands may appoint as many competent deputy mineral surveyors as shall apply for appointment to survey mining claims. The expenses of the survey of vein or lode claims and of the survey of placer claims, together with the cost of publication of notices, shall be paid by the applicants, and they shall be at liberty to obtain the same at the most reasonable rates, and they shall also be at liberty to employ any deputy mineral surveyor to make the survey. The chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands shall also have power to establish the maximum charges for surveys and publication of notices under this act; and in case of excessive charges for publication he may designate any newspaper published in a province where mines are situated, or in Manila, for the publication of mining notices and fix the rates to be charged by such paper; and to the end that the chief of the bureau of public lands may be fully informed on the subject, such applicant shall file with the provincial secretary, or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder, a sworn statement of all charges and fees paid by such applicant for publication and surveys, and of all fees and money paid the provincial treasurer or the collector of internal revenue, as the case may be, which statement shall be transmitted, with the other papers in the case, to the secretary of the interior for the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 48. That all affidavits required to be made under this act may be verified before any officer authorized to administer oaths within the province where the claims may be situated, and all testimony and proofs may be taken before any such officer, and, when duly certified by the officer taking the same, shall have the same force and effect as if taken before the proper provincial secretary or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder. In cases of contest as to the mineral or agricultural character of land the testimony and proofs may be taken as herein provided on personal notice of at least ten days to the opposing party; or if such party can not be found, then by publication at least once a week for thirty days in a newspaper to be designated by the provincial secretary or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder published nearest to the location of such land and in two newspapers published at Manila, one in the English language and one in the Spanish language, to be designated by the chief of the Philippine insular bureau of public lands; and the provincial secretary or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder shall require proofs that such notice has been given.

SEC. 49. That where nonmineral land not contiguous to the vein or lode is used or occupied by the proprietor of such vein or lode for mining or milling purposes, such nonadjacent surface ground may be embraced and included in an application for a patent for such vein or lode, and the same may be patented therewith, subject to the same preliminary requirements as to survey and notice as are applicable to veins or lodes; but no location of such nonadjacent land shall exceed 5 acres, and payment for the same must be made at the same rate as fixed by this act for the superficies of the lode. The owner of a quartz mill or reduction works not owning a mine in connection therewith may also receive a patent for his mill site as provided in this section.

SEC. 50. That as a condition of sale the United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, may provide rules for working, policing, and sanitation of mines, and rules concerning easements, drainage, water rights, right of way, right of government survey and inspection, and other necessary means to their complete development not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, and those conditions shall be fully expressed in the patent. The Commission or its successors are hereby further empowered to fix the bonds of deputy mineral surveyors.

SEC. 51. That whenever by priority of possession rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes have vested and accrued and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same, and the right of way for the construction of ditches and canals for the purposes herein specified is acknowledged and confirmed, but whenever any person, in the construction of any ditch or canal, injures or damages the possession of any settler on the public domain, the party committing such injury or damage shall be liable to the party injured for such injury or damage.

SEC. 52. That all patents granted shall be subject to any vested and accrued water rights, or rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water rights as may have been acquired under or recognized by the preceding section.

SEC. 53. That the United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, are authorized to establish land districts and provide for the appointment of the necessary officers wherever they may deem the same necessary for the public convenience, and to further provide that in districts where land offices are established proceedings required by this act to be had before provincial officers shall be had before the proper officers of such land offices.

SEC. 54. That every person above the age of 21 years, who is a citizen of the United States, a native of the Philippine Islands, or who has acquired the rights of a native of the Philippine Islands under and by virtue of the treaty of Paris, or any association of persons severally qualified as above, shall, upon application to the proper provincial treasurer, have the right to enter any quantity of vacant coal lands of the Philippine Islands not otherwise appropriated or reserved by competent authority, not exceeding 160 acres to such individual person, or 320 acres to such association, upon payment to the provincial treasurer or the collector of internal revenue, as the case may be, of not less than $10 per acre for such lands, where the same shall be situated more than 15 miles from any completed railroad or available harbor or navigable stream, and not less than $20 per acre for such lands as shall be within 15 miles of such road, harbor, or stream: Provided, That such entries shall be taken in squares of 40 or 160 acres, in conformity with the rules and regulations governing the public-land surveys of the United States in plotting legal subdivisions.

SEC. 55. That any person or association of persons, severally qualified as above provided, who have opened and improved, or shall hereafter open and improve, any coal mine or mines upon the public lands, and shall be in actual possession of the same, shall be entitled to a preference right of entry under the preceding section of the mines so opened and improved: Provided, That when any association of not less than four persons, severally qualified as above provided, shall have expended not less than $5,000 in working and improving any such mine or mines, such association may enter not exceeding 640 acres, including such mining improvements.

SEC. 56. That all claims under the preceding section must be presented to the proper provincial secretary within sixty days after the date of actual possession and the commencement of improvements on the land by the filing of a declaratory statement therefor; and where the improvements shall have been made prior to the expiration of three months from the date of the passage of this act, sixty days from the expiration of such three months shall be allowed for the filing of a declaratory statement; and no sale under the provisions of this act shall be allowed until the expiration of six months from the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 57. That the three preceding sections shall be held to authorize only one entry by the same person or association of persons; and no association of persons any member of which shall have taken the benefit of such sections, either as an individual or as a member of any other association, shall enter or hold any other lands under the provisions thereof; and no member of any association which shall have taken the benefit of such section shall enter or hold any other lands under their provisions; and all persons claiming under section 28 shall be required to prove their respective rights and pay for the lands filed upon within one year from the time prescribed for filing their respective claims; and upon failure to file the proper notice or to pay for the land within the required period the same shall be subject to entry by any other qualified applicant.

SEC. 58. That in case of conflicting claims upon coal lands where the improvements shall be commenced after the date of the passage of this act, priority of possession and improvement, followed by proper filing and continued good faith, shall determine the preference right to purchase. And also where improvements have already been made prior to the passage of this act, division of the land claimed may be made by legal subdivisions, which shall conform as nearly as practicable with the subdivisions of land under the United States system of public-land surveys, to include as near as may be the valuable improvements of the respective parties. The United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, are authorized to issue all needful rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this and preceding sections.

SEC. 59. That whenever it shall be made to appear to the secretary of any province in the Philippine Islands that any lands within the province are saline in character, it shall be the duty of said provincial secretary or adjutant-general, under the regulations of the United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, to take testimony in reference to such lands, to ascertain their true character, and to report the same to the secretary of the interior for the Philippine Islands; and if, upon such testimony, the secretary of the interior shall find that such lands are saline and incapable of being purchased under any of the laws relative to the public domain, then and in such case said lands shall be offered for sale at the office of the provincial secretary or such other officer as by the Philippine government may be described as mining recorder of the province or department in which the same shall be situated, as the case may be, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, and sold to the highest bidder, for cash, at a price of not less than $1.20 per acre; and in case such lands fail to sell when so offered, then the same shall be subject to private sale at such office, for cash, at a price not less than $1.20 per acre, in the same manner as other lands in the Philippine Islands are sold. All Executive proclamations relating to the sales of public saline lands shall be published in only two newspapers, one printed in the English language and one in the Spanish language, at Manila, which shall be designated by the secretary of the interior.

SEC. 60. That no act granting lands to provinces or corporations to aid in the construction of roads, or for other purposes, shall be so construed as to embrace mineral lands, which in all cases are reserved exclusively, unless otherwise specially provided in the act or acts making the grant.

SEC. 61. That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the rights of any person, partnership, or corporation having a valid, perfected mining concession granted prior to April 11, 1899, but all such concessions shall be conducted under the provisions of the law in force at the time they were granted, subject at all times to cancellation by reason of illegality in the procedure by which they were obtained, or for failure to comply with the conditions prescribed as requisite to their retention in the laws under which they were granted: Provided, That the owner or owners of every such concession shall cause the corners made by its boundaries to be distinctly marked with permanent monuments within ninety days after this act has been promulgated in the Philippine Islands, and that any concessions the boundaries of which are not so marked within this period shall be free and open to explorations and purchase under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 62. That mining rights on public lands in the Philippine Islands shall, after the passage of this act, be required only in accordance with its provisions.

SEC. 63. That the United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, are hereby empowered to establish a mining bureau, which shall discharge the duties prescribed for the "Inspeccion de minas" by the laws in force in the Philippine Islands prior to April 11, 1899, with reference to all perfected Spanish concessions, and shall discharge such further duties, not in conflict with the provisions of this act, with reference to the mineral wealth and the development of the mining industry in the Philippine Islands, as the United States Philippine Commission or its successors, may provide: Provided, That all proceedings for the cancellation of perfected Spanish concessions shall be conducted in the courts of the Philippine Islands having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, unless the United States Philippine Commission, or its successors, shall create special tribunals for the determination of such controversies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 64, page 62, line 9, after the word "estate," to strike out "together with appurtenances and hereditaments thereunto belonging;" so as to read:

That the government of the Philippine Islands is hereby authorized to acquire, receive, hold, maintain, and convey title to real and personal property, and may acquire real estate, for public uses, by the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 62, in line 12, before the word "That," to insert "SEC. 65;" in the same line, after the word "hereinbefore," to strike out "in this section;" in line 13, after the word "conferred," to insert "in section 63;" in the same line, after the word "may," to insert "also;" in line 14, after the word "lands," to insert "easements, appurtenances, and hereditaments;" in line 21, after the word "acquire," to strike out "said lands" and insert "the lands mentioned in this section;" in line 24, after the word "value," to insert "in gold coin of the United States of the present standard value or the equivalent in value in money of the Philippine Islands;" in line 6, after the ward "four," to insert "and a half;" and in line 18, after the word "Islands," to strike out:

and may be received by the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States as security for circulating notes issued under authority of the national-bank act as amended by this act; and circulating notes secured by the deposit of said bonds shall be subject only to the tax upon circulation provided by section 13 of the act of March 14, 1900, entitled "An act to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes;"

and on page 64, line 5, after the word "this," to strike out "act" and insert "section;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 65. That the powers hereinbefore conferred in section 63 may also be exercised in respect of any lands, easements, appurtenances, and hereditaments which, on the 13th of August, 1898, were owned or held by associations, corporations, communities, religious orders, or private individuals in such large tracts or parcels as in the opinion of the Commission injuriously affect the welfare of the people of the Philippine Islands. And for the purpose of providing funds to acquire the lands mentioned in this section said government of the Philippines is hereby empowered to incur indebtedness, to borrow money, and to issue, and to sell at not less than par value, in gold coin of the United States of the present standard value or the equivalent in value in money of the Philippine Islands, upon such terms and conditions as it may deem best, registered or coupon bonds of the government of the Philippine Islands for such amount as may be necessary, said bonds to be in denominations of $50 or any multiple thereof, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 4½ per cent per annum, payable quarterly, and to be payable at the pleasure of the government of the Philippine Islands after dates named in said bonds not less than five nor more than thirty years from the date of their issue, together with interest thereon, in gold coin of the United States of the present standard value or the equivalent in value in money of the Philippine Islands; and said bonds shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the government of the Philippine Islands and the Government of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority in the United States or the Philippine Islands. The moneys which may be realized or received from the issue and sale of said bonds shall be applied by the government of the Philippine Islands to the acquisition of the property authorized by this section, and to no other purpose.

Mr. LODGE. There is a misprint there. It should be "section 64." I move to amend the amendment in line 13 by striking out "sixty-three" and insert "sixty-four."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 66, page 64, line 8, before the word "shall," to strike out "this enactment" and insert "section 65 of this act;" in line 13, after the word "Provided," to strike out "however;" in line 16, after the word "Philippines," to strike out "and that all deferred payments of the purchase price shall bear interest not less than that borne by the bonds," and insert:

All deferred payments and the interest thereon shall be payable in the money prescribed for the payment of principal and interest of the bonds authorized to be issued in payment of said lands by section 65 of this act, and said deferred payments shall bear interest not less than that borne by the bonds. All moneys realized or received from sales or other disposition of said lands or by reason thereof shall constitute a trust fund for the payment of principal and interest of said bonds, and also constitute a sinking fund for the payment of said bonds at their maturity.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 66. That all lands acquired by virtue of section 65 of this act shall constitute a part and portion of the public property of the government of the Philippine Islands, and may be leased, let, sold, and conveyed by the government of the Philippines on such terms and conditions as it may prescribe: Provided, that the price to be paid by a purchaser shall in no case be less than the appraised value fixed thereon at the time of acquisition thereof by said government of the Philippines. All deferred payments and the interest thereon shall be payable in the money prescribed for the payment of principal and interest of the bonds authorized to be issued in payment of said lands by section 65 of this act, and said deferred payments shall bear interest not less than that borne by the bonds. All moneys realized or received from sales or other disposition of said lands or by reason thereof shall constitute a trust fund for the payment of principal and interest of said bonds, and also constitute a sinking fund for the payment of said bonds at their maturity. Actual settlers and occupants at the time said lands are acquired by the government shall have the preference over all others to lease, purchase, or acquire their holdings within such reasonable time as may be determined by said government.

The next amendment was, on page 65, after line 7, to strike out the following:

SEC. 52. That all moneys realized or received from sales or other disposition of said lands, or by reason thereof, shall constitute a sinking fund to meet the obligations of said bonds and to retire them at the time fixed and specified in the bonds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 67, page 65, line 21, after the word "dollars," to insert "or in causes in which the value in controversy exceeds $5,000;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 67. That the Supreme Court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to review, revise, reverse, modify, or affirm the final judgments and decrees of the supreme court of the Philippine Islands in all actions, cases, causes, and proceedings now pending therein or hereafter determined thereby in which the Constitution or any statute, treaty, title, right, privilege, or obligation of the United States is involved, or in which the title or possession of real estate exceeding in value the sum of $5,000, or in causes in which the value in controversy exceeds $5,000, to be ascertained by the oath of either party or of other competent witnesses, is involved or brought in question; and such final judgments or decrees may and can be reviewed, revised, reversed, modified, or affirmed by said Supreme Court of the United States on appeal or writ of error by the party aggrieved, in the same manner, under the same regulations, and by the same procedure, as far as applicable, as the final judgments and decrees of the circuit courts of the United States.

Mr. RAWLINS. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to this amendment. In connection with what follows he will see that it is ungrammatical.

Mr. LODGE. What does the Senator suggest?

Mr. RAWLINS. It should come in, it seems to me, after the word "involved" or after the word "question."

Mr. LODGE. The Senator thinks the amendment ought to come in in line 19, after the word "involved?"

Mr. RAWLINS. I think so.

Mr. LODGE. I think that would be better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee modify their amendment so as to insert the words proposed to be inserted after the word "involved," in line 19; so as to read:

In which the Constitution or any statute, treaty, title, right, privilege, or obligation of the United States is involved, or in causes in which the value in controversy exceeds $5,000, or in which the title or possession of real estate exceeding in value the sum of $5,000, to be ascertained by the oath of either party.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 68, page 66, line 20, after the words "per annum," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the entire indebtedness of any municipality under this provision shall not exceed 5 per cent of the assessed valuation of the property in said municipality, and any obligation in excess of such limit shall be null and void.

So that the section will read:

SEC. 68. That for the purpose of providing funds to construct sewers, to furnish adequate sewer drainage facilities, to secure a sufficient supply of water, and to provide all kinds of municipal betterments and improvements in municipalities, the government of the Philippine Islands, under such limitations, terms, and conditions as it may prescribe, with the consent and approval of the President of the United Sates, may permit any municipality of said islands to incur indebtedness, borrow money, and to issue and sell (at not less than par value) registered or coupon bonds in such amount and payable at such time as may be determined by the government of the Philippines, with interest thereon not to exceed 5 per cent per annum: Provided, That the entire indebtedness of any municipality under this provision shall not exceed 5 per cent of the assessed valuation of the property in said municipality, and any obligation in excess of such limit shall be null and void.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 72, page 68, line 15, after the words "per annum," to insert: "This loan may be in addition to the total indebtedness provided in section 67 of this act;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 72. That for the purpose of providing funds to construct sewers in the city of Manila and to furnish it with an adequate sewer and drainage system and supply of water the government of the Philippine Islands, with the approval of the President of the United States, is hereby authorized to permit the municipality of Manila to incur indebtedness, to borrow money, and to issue and sell (at not less than par value), upon such terms and conditions as it may deem best, registered or coupon bonds of the city of Manila to an amount not exceeding $4,000,000 lawful money of the United States, payable at such time or times as may be determined by the government of the Philippines, with interest thereon not to exceed 5 per cent per annum. This loan may be in addition to the total indebtedness provided in section 67 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 76, page 70, in line 7, after the word "That," to insert, "no private property shall be taken for any purpose under this section without just compensation paid or tendered therefor, and that;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 76. That the government of the Philippine Islands may grant franchises, privileges, and concessions, including the authority to exercise the right of eminent domain for the construction and operation of works of public utility and service, and may authorize said works to be constructed and maintained over and across the public property of the United States, including streets, highways, squares, and reservations, and over similar property of the government of the Philippine Islands, and may adopt rules and regulations under which the provincial and municipal governments of the islands may grant the right to use and occupy such public property belonging to said provinces or municipalities: Provided, That no private property shall be taken for any purpose under this section without just compensation paid or tendered therefor, and that such authority to take and occupy land shall not authorize the taking, use, or occupation of any land except such as is required for the actual necessary purposes, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out sections 64 to 109, inclusive, in the following words:

ESTABLISHING A COINAGE SYSTEM.

SEC. 64. That the gold dollar of the United States, consisting of 25$\frac{8}{10}$ grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, as defined by section 3511 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be the standard unit of value in the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 65. That there shall be coined for use in the Philippine Islands a coin of the denomination of 1 peso, which shall contain 25 grams of silver of the fineness of eight hundred and thirty-five one-thousandths. The peso shall be divisible into 100 equal parts, called centavos, and there shall be coined silver pieces of 50 centavos, 20 centavos, and 10 centavos, containing silver of the same fineness and in equal proportions with the peso.

SEC. 66. That the silver peso and its subdivisions shall contain devices to be prescribed by the government of the Philippine Islands, which shall express or symbolize the sovereignty of the United States, the fact that the coins are issued for use in the Philippine Islands, the denominations of the coins, and the date of their coinage.

SEC. 67. That the silver peso and the other silver coins issued under authority of this act shall be legal tender in the Philippine Islands for all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract, at the rate of 2 pesos for $1 of the legal gold money of the United States.

SEC. 68. That all lawful money of the United States, while maintained at parity with gold, shall be legal tender in the Philippine Islands at the rate fixed in section — of this act, for all debts, public and private: Provided, That for amounts under 100 pesos the silver currency of the Philippine Islands authorized by this act shall, when demanded, be paid.

SEC. 69. That the silver coins authorized under this act shall be coined under the authority of the government of the Philippine Islands, in such amounts as it may determine, with the approval of the Secretary of War of the United States, from the bullion contained in coins received for public dues as hereinafter provided, and from silver bullion produced in the United States purchased by the government of the Philippine Islands, with the approval of the Secretary of War of the United States: Provided, That such purchases of silver bullion may be made from the Treasury of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, from the bullion purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," and held in excess of the amount required for the redemption in full of the Treasury notes issued under the provisions of said act; and such bullion may be sold to the government of the Philippine Islands at a price to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, not less than the average market price for the fiscal year 1900.

SEC. 70. That the Mexican silver pesos now in use in the Philippine Islands shall be receivable for public dues at a rate to be fixed by quarterly proclamation of the civil governor of said islands until such date, not earlier than the 31st day of December, 1903, as may be fixed by public proclamation of said civil governor, when such coins shall cease to be receivable: Provided, That such proclamation last named shall be issued and printed in at least two daily newspapers published in the city of Manila at least sixty days before the date on which such coins cease to be receivable: And provided further, That the public offices of the government of the Philippine Islands may at any time refuse to receive such coins which appear to be counterfeit or defective.

SEC. 71. That the silver pesos and subsidiary silver coins issued under authority of the Spanish Government for use in the Philippine Islands shall be receivable for public dues at a rate to be fixed by public proclamation of the civil governor, when such coins shall cease to be so receivable, subject to the same provisions as those prescribed for the redemption of Mexican pesos under section 7 of this act.

SEC. 72. That the Philippine government is authorized to issue minor coins of the denomination of 1 centavo and 5 centavos, and such minor coins shall be legal tender in the Philippine Islands for amounts not exceeding 10 pesos. The alloy for the pieces of 5 centavos shall be of copper and nickel, to be composed of three-fourths copper and one-fourth nickel. The alloy of the piece of 1 centavo shall be 95 per cent of copper and 5 per cent of tin and zinc, in such proportions as shall be determined by the government of the Philippine Islands. The weight of the piece of 5 centavos shall be 77.16 grains troy, and of the piece of 1 centavo 72 grains.

SEC. 73. That for the purchase of metal for the minor coinage authorized by this act an appropriation may be made by the government of the Philippine Islands from its current funds, which shall be reimbursed from the proceeds of the coinage executed under said section; but the amount of the gain or seigniorage arising from the coinage of such minor coins shall be credited and paid into the currency reserve fund.

SEC. 74. That the coinage authorized under this act may be executed at the mint of the government of the Philippine Islands at Manila, or arrangements may be made by the government of the Philippine Islands with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for the execution of such coinage at the mints of the United States at a charge covering the reasonable cost of the work.

SEC. 75. That the profit or seigniorage arising from the coinage under this act shall be set aside as a special fund, to be known as the currency reserve fund, and shall be employed in maintaining the parity of the silver coins issued under this act with the gold money of the United States. Such fund shall be converted as far as practicable into gold, but may be kept in part in the Treasury of the United States or in any national bank of the United States approved by the government of the Philippine Islands and furnishing sureties acceptable to it.

SEC. 76. That the government of the Philippine Islands is authorized and directed to maintain at all times the parity of the silver coins issued under this act with the gold money of the United States, and for this purpose may, in its discretion—

First. Pay gold coin for silver coin.

Second. Pay silver coin for gold coin.

Third. Sell drafts on its deposits in the United States at a reasonable rate, not exceeding the usual cost of exchange.

Fourth. Transfer any form of money from the current funds of the Philippine government to the currency reserve fund.

Fifth. Issue temporary certificates of indebtedness, bearing interest at a reasonable rate, payable at periods of three months or more, but not later than one year, from the date of issue, which shall be in the denomination of $50 or 100 pesos, or some multiple of such sum, and shall be redeemable in gold coin of the United States or in lawful money of the Philippine Islands according to the terms of issue prescribed by the government of the Philippine Islands; but the amount of such certificates outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $5,000,000.

Sixth. Buy gold coin or bullion at a cost not exceeding reasonable charges for its importation into the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 77. That the proceeds in money or bullion derived from any of the operations authorized by section —— of this act shall be deposited in the treasury of the government of the Philippine Islands to the credit of the currency reserve fund; but such deposits shall be transferred to the current funds of the treasury of the Philippine Is ands when in the judgment of the government of the Philippine Islands they are no longer required in the currency reserve fund for maintaining the parity of Philippine silver coin with the legal gold coin of the United States: Provided, That the money and bullion contained in the currency reserve fund shall never be reduced below the combined amount of the profit arising from the coinage authorized by this act and the proceeds of the sale of drafts upon the United States, except for expenses connected with the transfer of funds and the purchase of gold.

SEC. 78. That the treasurer of the Philippine Islands is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to receive deposits of the silver coin authorized by this act to be coined at the treasury of the government of the Philippine Islands or any of its branches in sums of not less than $20, and to issue silver certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $5, and coin so deposited shall be retained in the treasury and held for the payment of such certificates on demand, and used for no other purpose. Such certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued, and when held by any banking association may be counted as a part of its lawful cash reserve.

SEC. 79. That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Director of the Mint of the United States are hereby authorized and directed, when requested by the government of the Philippine Islands, to make and prepare any drawings, designs, and plates, and execute any coinage, engraving, or printing of notes and certificates authorized by this act, and to make a proper charge for the same, covering as nearly as may be the actual cost, which shall be defrayed from the revenues of the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 80. That all the acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act, and all provisions of law in force in the Philippine Islands making any form of money legal tender after December 31, 1903, except as provided in this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 81. That the government of the Philippine Islands shall have the power to make all necessary appropriations and all proper regulations for the redemption and reissue of worn or defective coins and for carrying out all other provisions of this act relating to coinage.

THE REGULATION OF BANKING.

SEC. 82. That no person, firm, association, or corporation shall be permitted to conduct a banking business or to establish or maintain a branch bank in the Philippine Islands after the 30th day of June, 1902, without a license in writing granted by the government of the Philippine Islands. Such license shall be granted, in the discretion of the government of the Philippine Islands, upon application in writing, setting forth the names and domicile of the applicants proposing to do a banking business; the nature of the business, the amount of capital proposed to be employed, and such other particulars as may be required by said government, and said license may be revoked at any time.

SEC. 83. That the provisions of section 5243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States prohibiting the use of the word "national" in the title of any bank not incorporated under the national-bank act of the United States are hereby made applicable to the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 84. That all persons, firms, associations, or corporations engaged in the business of banking in the Philippine Islands shall comply with all regulations which may be prescribed by the government of the Philippine Islands; and full power is hereby conferred upon said government of the Philippine Islands to frame regulations regarding the business of any bank and to appoint a receiver for winding up its affairs when, in the judgment of said government, such course is justified, and to impose and enforce proper penalties for failure to comply with such regulations and with the authorized acts of said government.

SEC. 85. That the government of the Philippine Islands may appoint a suitable person or persons, who may be the same as the person designated by the Comptroller of the Currency for the examination of national banks in the Philippine Islands, which person shall have the power to make thorough examination from time to time into all the affairs of persons, firms, associations, or corporations engaged in the business of banking in the Philippine Islands, and in so doing to examine any of the officers and agents of such banks under oath, and who shall make a full and detailed report of their condition to the government of the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 86. That all laws relative to national banking associations shall, so far as they are applicable, have the same force and effect in the Philippine Islands as in the United States, subject to the provisions and limitations of this act; and the provisions of section 5146 of the Revised Statutes are hereby amended so that any resident of the Philippine Islands otherwise qualified may lawfully act as director of a national bank established or having branches in said islands, and no other qualifications shall be required as to residence except that a majority of the board of directors of any such national bank shall be citizens of the United States or natives of the Philippine Islands, or persons who have, under and by virtue of the treaty of Paris, acquired the political rights of natives of the Philippine Islands; but applications for the incorporation of national banks in the Philippine Islands shall first have the approval of the government of the Philippine Islands before being approved by the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States.

SEC. 87. That the national banks established in the Philippine Islands under authority of section — of this act and national banks of the United States shall have authority, with the approval of the government of the Philippine Islands, to establish branches in any part of said islands, and, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States, to establish branches in reserved cities of the United States: Provided, That such branches, when established in the United States, shall not discount commercial bills or make advances upon securities when such transactions are wholly carried on within the United States.

SEC. 88. That circulating notes may be issued in the Philippine Islands by any national bank established under the provisions of this act or having branches in the Philippine Islands, subject to the approval in writing of the government of the Philippine Islands and of the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States, and under the conditions and limitations of the national-bank act as modified by this act: Provided, That no bank now existing, and no national bank hereafter established in the Philippine Islands, shall be authorized to issue circulating notes of any class or classes.

SEC. 89. That circulating notes may be issued by the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States to any national bank established or having branches in the Philippine Islands to the amount of 50 per cent of the paid-up and unimpaired capital of the issuing bank without any deposit of United States bonds, as required by the national-bank act: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as repealing the requirements of section 5159 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by section 8 of the act of July 12, 1882, entitled "An act," etc., that certain deposits of United States bonds with the Treasurer of the United States shall be required as preliminary to the commencement of the banking business, but such bonds may, in the discretion of the Treasurer of the United States, be deposited to his order in the treasury of the Philippine Islands, and shall be held as a part of the security for circulating notes in the same manner as provided by the national-bank act: And provided further, That circulating notes issued under this act and not secured in full by the deposit of United States bonds with the Treasurer of the United States shall not be paid out or be put in circulation by any bank except in the Philippine Islands, shall bear distinctive language and devices, to be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States, with the approval of the government of the Philippine Islands, and shall have a first lien upon all the assets of the issuing bank over all other claims except authorized deposits of officers of the United States and of the government of the Philippine Islands, and except bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as specific security for additional circulating notes.

SEC. 90. That upon all outstanding circulating notes issued under the provisions of this act there shall be paid a tax equal, as nearly as may be, to one-half of 1 per cent per annum during the period for which such notes may be in circulation. Said taxes shall be levied under regulations prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency and shall be assessed by the Treasurer of the United States. Such regulations shall provide for the assessment of the tax upon notes actually in circulation outside the issuing bank at convenient dates, not less than four in any month, as fixed by the Comptroller of the Currency, and said Comptroller may prescribe and require from any banking association making application for circulation under this act such periodical or other reports as he may deem desirable for determining the condition of the bank.

SEC. 91. That the tax upon circulation authorized by this act may be collected by the Treasurer of the United States from any funds or money in the Treasury to the credit of the bank upon which such taxes are assessed, and a fine not exceeding $500 may be imposed by the Comptroller of the Currency upon any bank failing for one month after notice by the Treasurer of the United States to restore such funds or money to the amounts required by law, and the continued neglect of any bank to pay such taxes or fines or restore such moneys shall be, in the discretion of said Comptroller of the Currency, sufficient ground for the appointment of a receiver for such bank.

SEC. 92. That the proceeds of the taxes herein prescribed shall constitute a fund to be known as the "bank-note guaranty fund of the Philippine Islands," and such fund shall not be reduced or impaired except for the purpose of redeeming the circulating notes of failed banks, as hereinafter prescribed.

SEC. 93. That whenever the Comptroller of the Currency shall have become satisfied by the protest or the waiver and admission specified in section 5226 or by the report provided for in section 5227 of the Revised Statutes of the United States that any banking association doing business in the Philippine Islands has refused to pay its circulating notes on demand in lawful money, he shall direct the redemption of such notes from the bank-note guaranty fund aforesaid, and such notes shall thereupon be so redeemed. The Comptroller of the Currency shall collect for the benefit of said fund, from the assets of the bank and from the stockholders thereof, such sum as shall equal the amount of its circulating notes outstanding; and for the purposes of this section all provisions of the national-bank act relating to the issue and redemption of circulating notes and proceedings against failed banks for failure to pay such notes, except the duplicate liability of stockholders, shall be applicable to any bank issuing circulating notes in the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 94. That whenever the Comptroller of the Currency has sold at public auction, under the provisions of section 5230 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the United States bonds held to secure the currency notes of any failed bank issued under the provisions of the national-bank act, any excess in the amount received for said bonds above their par value shall be applied to the payment of the outstanding circulating notes of said bank issued under the provisions of this act, and for this purpose the United States shall have a paramount lien upon any such excess, but any further excess above the amount required for this purpose shall be covered into the general assets of the bank.

SEC. 95. That any banking association desiring to withdraw from circulation any of its circulating notes issued under the provisions of this act may transmit the same to the Treasurer of the United States for cancellation, or may pay into the Treasury in lawful money of the United States or of the Philippine Islands an amount equal to the amount of the notes to be withdrawn, in the manner prescribed by sections 5222, 5224, and 5225 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The taxes upon such circulating notes thus withdrawn from circulation shall thereupon cease, and the Comptroller of the Currency shall redeem them from time to time, as said notes are received for redemption, from the amounts paid into the Treasury as hereinbefore prescribed.

SEC. 96. That any bank issuing circulating notes in the Philippine Islands shall at all times keep on hand, at its head office or its branches in the Philippine Islands, a reserve equal in amount to 25 per cent of the amount of said notes outstanding, which reserve shall be in lawful money of the Philippine Islands or of the United States, or both: Provided, That one-half of such reserve may be kept in first-class bills of exchange drawn upon the United States or upon foreign countries and payable in gold, or on deposits in some other bank or banks approved by the government of the Philippine Islands: And provided further, That no reserve against circulation shall be required to be kept at the branches of national banks having their head offices in the United States when no notes of said banks are paid out by them at said branches.

SEC. 97. That any bank doing business in the Philippine Islands which fails to have on hand at the close of any month the legal reserve against circulation required by section 11 of this act shall pay into the treasury of the Philippine Islands a penalty of one-quarter of 1 per cent upon the excess of the amount of its outstanding circulating notes above four times such legal reserve, and the proceeds of such payments shall be added to the bank-note guaranty fund hereinbefore provided for.

SEC. 98. That banking associations taking out circulating notes under the provisions of this act shall, in addition to the bank-note guaranty fund, deposit and maintain in the Treasury of the United States a fund of 5 per cent of their outstanding notes, subject to the laws governing the redemption fund held under existing law for the current redemption of currency notes issued under the provisions of the national-bank act.

SEC. 99. That all provisions of existing law regarding the issue of national currency notes and the manner of dealing with redeemed, mutilated, or incomplete currency notes, and all such provisions relating to the redemption of currency notes of liquidating banks, shall be applicable, so far as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, to the circulating notes herein provided for, and all powers granted by existing law to the Comptroller of the Currency and to the Treasurer of the United States in regard to the issue of currency notes to national banks, the collection of taxes, and the infliction of penalties for noncompliance with law are hereby extended to such officers in respect to the circulating notes issued under the provisions of this act, so far as such powers are not inconsistent with other provisions of this act; and all judicial processes authorized by existing law in regard to national currency notes issued to national banks are hereby extended, so far as they are applicable, to circulating notes issued under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 100. That the Treasurer of the United States and Comptroller of the Currency are hereby authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to make all proper arrangements with the government of the Philippine Islands for the designation of any financial officer of said government as the agent and lawful representative of said Treasurer and Comptroller for the purpose of carrying on transactions in relation to the issue and redemption of circulating notes in the Philippine Islands, and the keeping of the several funds, in whole or in part, relating to such notes which are required by this act to be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, and such officer so designated is hereby authorized to act as such agent and representative of said Treasurer and said Comptroller.

SEC. 101. That it shall not be lawful for any bank accepting deposits to establish branches or for any bank to issue circulating notes under authority of this act unless said bank has a paid-up and unimpaired capital not less in amount than $500,000.

SEC. 102. That no circulating notes shall be issued by any bank in the Philippine Islands for a less denomination than 5 pesos or $2.50, and the amount of the notes outstanding below the denominations of 20 pesos or $10 shall not exceed 50 per cent of the maximum amount of its authorized circulation.

SEC. 103. That the Spanish-Filipino Bank shall be required to comply, on or before December 31, 1902, with all the requirements of this act in regard to the issue of circulating notes, except that the amount of such notes outstanding may be equal to the entire paid-up and unimpaired capital of the bank without any deposit of United States bonds to secure circulation, as required by the national-bank act; and said bank may exclude from the limit of its authorized circulation all or any part of its notes issued prior to the year 1884 and now outstanding: Provided, That such notes when redeemed shall be canceled and retired and not reissued and that said bank shall pay into the treasury of the Philippine Islands 50 per cent of the face value of such issues so excluded, which sum shall constitute an obligation of said treasury to said bank, to be repaid from time to time to the amount of 50 per cent of such notes when redeemed by said bank and presented and surrendered to said treasury of the Philippine Islands: And provided further, That in case of the failure or the liquidation of the said Spanish-Filipino Bank, any money thus transferred to the treasury of the Philippine Islands and not previously repaid shall be paid to the receiver or authorized liquidators for the benefit of the creditors of said bank.

SEC. 104. That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States are hereby authorized and directed, when requested by the government of the Philippine Islands, to make and prepare any drawings, designs, and plates, and execute any engraving or printing of notes and certificates authorized by this act, and to make a proper charge for the same in accordance with the provisions of the national-bank act or other regulations to be framed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 105. That none of the bank notes authorized by this act to be issued in the Philippine Islands, or which may be in circulation under existing law, shall be legal tender for debt, unless expressly stipulated in the contract; but such notes may be received for public dues, in the discretion of the government of the Philippine Islands, only when and so long as they are redeemed on demand at their face value by the issuing bank in the lawful money of the Philippine Islands or of the United States.

SEC. 106. That banks for the exclusive purposes of making loans upon land and buildings, secured by mortgage, and for making loans upon agricultural products, may be organized in the Philippine Islands, with the approval of the government of said islands, and may issue and sell, from time to time, bonds for the amount of their loans in excess of their capital: Provided, That no such bank shall be authorized which shall not have at the time of beginning business a paid up and unimpaired capital not less in amount than $250,000; that such banks shall not loan more than 10 per cent of its aggregate resources to any one person, firm, association, or corporation; that such bank shall not loan upon any piece of real estate or agricultural property more than one-third the market value of such property, as determined under regulations to be framed by the government of the Philippine Islands; that such bank shall not loan more than one-third of its aggregate resources upon the security of building lots or buildings in municipalities having a population of more than 10,000; and that such bank shall be subject to such visitations and inspection and shall make such reports and comply in all respects with such regulations as may be required or imposed by the government of the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 107. That any bank authorized to do business in the Philippine Islands and having a capital not less in amount than $1,000,000, may, with the approval of the government of the Philippine Islands, devote an amount not exceeding one-fourth part of its capital to the class of loans secured by mortgage, and loans upon agricultural products, described in the next preceding section of this act, subject to the conditions and restrictions therein provided; and the limitations imposed in said section upon the business of a bank devoted exclusively to loans secured by mortgage and loans upon agricultural products shall apply to the portion of its capital set aside by any other bank for such classes of business.

SEC. 108. That the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized to receive deposits in money from the government of the Philippine Islands, and to transfer funds, draw and accept checks, drafts, and transfers, and to perform any other financial operations on behalf of the said government of the Philippine Islands which may be agreed upon between said government and the Secretary of the Treasury; but nothing in this section shall be construed to permit the expenditure of the funds of the United States for meeting the obligations of the government of the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 109. That the treasury of the government of the Philippine Islands and its branches, and such banking associations and their branches in the Philippine Islands as may be designated by the Secretary of War of the United States, shall be depositories of public money, subject to the provisions of existing law governing such depositories in the United States: Provided, That the treasury of the government of the Philippine Islands shall not be required to deposit bonds in the Treasury of the United States or to give other specific securities for the safe-keeping of public money except as prescribed, in his discretion, by the Secretary of War.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 78. That the Philippine government is hereby authorized to establish a mint at the city of Manila, in the Philippine Islands, for coinage purposes, and the coins hereinafter authorized may be coined at said mint. And the said government is hereby authorized to enact laws necessary for such establishment: Provided, That the laws of the United States relating to mints and coinage, so far as applicable, are hereby extended to the coinage of said islands.

SEC. 79. That the said Philippine government is authorized to coin a silver dollar, which shall contain 416 grains of standard silver, and the standard of said silver coins shall be such that of 1,000 parts by weight 900 shall be of pure metal and 100 of alloy, and the alloy shall be of copper. And upon the said silver dollar there shall be devices and inscriptions to be prescribed by the government of the Philippine Islands, with the approval of the Secretary of War of the United States, which devices and inscriptions shall express or symbolize the sovereignty of the United States and that it is a coin of the Philippine Islands, together with the denomination of the coin expressed in English, Filipino, and Chinese characters, and the date of its coinage.

SEC. 80. That any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at the mint in the Philippine Islands, to be coined as hereinbefore provided. Silver bullion brought to the mint of the Philippine Islands for coinage shall be received and coined by the proper officers for the benefit of the depositor: Provided, That it shall be lawful to refuse at the mint any deposit of less than $100, and also any bullion so base as to be unsuitable for the operations of the mint: And provided also, That when gold is combined with said bullion in such small proportion that it can not be separated advantageously no allowance shall be made for such gold to the depositor.

SEC. 81. That when bullion is brought to the mint for coinage it shall be weighed by the treasurer in the presence of the depositor, when practicable, and a receipt given, which shall state the description and weight of the bullion: Provided, That when the bullion is in such a state as to require melting before the true weight in silver can be ascertained, the weight after melting shall be considered as the true weight of the bullion deposited.

SEC. 82. That there shall be charged to the depositor by the mint for such coinage 1 cent for each dollar coined, and the amount received from these charges shall be accounted for and appropriated toward defraying the expense of coining and the contingent expenses of the mint.

SEC. 83. That the dollar hereinbefore authorized may be coined at the mint of the United States at San Francisco, in California, upon the request of the government of the Philippine Islands, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and the owners of silver bullion may deposit the same for coinage at such mint under regulations to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States as respects deposits, coinage, and transfer to the Philippine Islands, and a charge shall be made therefor at the rate of 1 cent for each dollar coined and the cost of transfer to the Philippine Islands in addition thereto: Provided, That such deposits at the San Francisco mint shall be confined to silver produced in the United States.

SEC. 84. That the Philippine government is also authorized to coin, for use in the Philippine Islands, a coin of the denomination of 50 cents and of the weight of 192.9 grains, a coin of the denomination of 20 cents and of the weight of 77.16 grains, and a coin of the denomination of 10 cents and of the weight of 38.58 grains; and the standard of said silver coins shall be such that of 1,000 parts by weight 900 shall be of pure metal and 100 of alloy, and the alloy shall be of copper.

SEC. 85. That the subsidiary silver coins authorized by the preceding section shall be coined under the authority of the government of the Philippine Islands in such amounts as it may determine, with the approval of the Secretary of War of the United States, from silver bullion purchased by the government of the Philippine Islands, with the approval of the Secretary of War of the United States: Provided, That the Philippine government may in addition and its discretion recoin the Spanish Filipino dollars and subsidiary silver coins issued under the authority of the Spanish Government for use in the Philippine Islands into the subsidiary coins provided for in the preceding section at such rate and under such regulations as it may prescribe.

SEC. 86. That the silver dollar issued under authority of this act shall be legal tender in the Philippine Islands for all debts, public and private, except where otherwise provided by law or expressly stipulated in the contract, and the subsidiary silver coins authorized by this act shall be legal tender in the Philippine Islands to the amount of $10.

SEC. 87. That the Philippine government is also authorized to issue minor coins of the denominations of one-half cent, 1 cent, and 5 cents, and such minor coins shall be legal tender in the Philippine Islands for amounts not exceeding $1. The alloy of the 5-cent piece shall be of copper and nickel, to be composed of three-fourths copper and one-fourth nickel. The alloy of the 1-cent and one-half-cent pieces shall be 95 per centum of copper and 5 per centum of tin and zinc in such proportions as shall be determined by the government of the Philippine Islands. The weight of the 5-cent piece shall be 77 and sixteen-hundredths grains troy, and of the 1-cent piece 80 grains troy, and of the one-half-cent piece 40 grains troy.

SEC. 88. That for the purchase of metal for the subsidiary and minor coinage, authorized by sections 84 and 87, an appropriation may be made by the government of the Philippine Islands from its current funds, which shall be reimbursed from the coinage under said sections; and the gain or seigniorage arising therefrom shall be paid into the treasury of the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 89. That the subsidiary and minor coinage hereinbefore authorized may be coined at the mint of the government of the Philippine Islands at Manila, or arrangements may be made by the said government with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for their coinage at any of the mints of the United States, at a charge covering the reasonable cost of the work.

SEC. 90. That the treasurer of the Philippine Islands is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to receive deposits of the silver dollars authorized by this act at the treasury of the government of the Philippine Islands or any of its branches in sums of not less than $20, and to issue silver certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $10, and the coin so deposited shall be retained in the Philippine treasury and held for the payment of such certificates on demand, and used for no other purpose. Such certificates shall be receivable in the Philippine Islands for customs, taxes, and all public dues, unless otherwise provided by law, and when so received may be reissued.

SEC. 91. That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized, when requested by the government of the Philippine Islands, to make and prepare any drawings, designs, and plates, and execute any engraving or printing of certificates authorized by the preceding section, and to make a proper charge for the same, covering as nearly as may be the actual cost, which shall be defrayed from the revenues of the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 92. That all provisions of law in force in the Philippine Islands making any form of money legal tender after December 31, 1905, except as provided in this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 93. That the government of the Philippine Islands shall have the power to make all necessary appropriations and all proper regulations for the redemption and reissue of worn or defective coins and for carrying out all other provisions of this act relating to coinage.

At the conclusion of the reading of section 79 of the proposed amendment,

Mr. WELLINGTON said: I ask that that section go over, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator from Maryland that all these sections form but one amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection——

Mr. WELLINGTON. I was alluding to the section in reference to the coinage of the silver dollar.

Mr. LODGE. Of course the whole thing will be afterwards open to amendment, and may be discussed just the same as if the amendment had not been adopted. I only want to have the bill printed as amended.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I want to reserve the right to amend the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; the Senator will have the right to reserve any amendment now agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to understand that. Is it understood that any of the committee amendments which are adopted as in Committee of the Whole will again be open to amendment as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the understanding?

Mr. LODGE. That is the understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, then, will recognize that as the understanding of the Senate; otherwise the amendments could only be again amended after the bill had been reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that.

Mr. WELLINGTON. That is also my understanding of it.

Mr. LODGE. My desire was that the amendments in any part, after adoption, should be open to amendment by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair now so understands it. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerks inform the Chair that two amendments have been passed over.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any object in passing them over, providing the amendments are all to be subject to amendment as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. RAWLINS. Under that arrangement, there is no objection to the amendments which have been passed over being adopted, with the right reserved to further amend them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It occurred to the Chair that, as it has been agreed that all the amendments will be open to amendment as in Committee of the Whole, it would be just as well to have the amendments, which have been passed over, agreed to now.

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. That will cover three sections—5, 6, and 7. It is really one amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be regarded as agreed to. As under the arrangement made the bill can be further amended, all the amendments will be open to amendment, as in Committee of the Whole, as if they were part of the original text.

Mr. LODGE. The whole bill as amended will be open to amendment as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment to section 10 was passed over, and I ask that it may be considered as agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be agreed to, in the absence of objection. The Chair hears no objection, and it is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Now, I ask that the bill as it has been amended may be reprinted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I offer a series of amendments to the bill, which I ask to have read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend said bill as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. RAWLINS to the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes, viz:

Strike out section 1 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the executive power of the Philippine Islands shall be vested in a governor, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall reside therein and hold his office during the term of three years, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States. He shall be commander in chief of the militia of said islands; shall have power to grant pardons for offenses against the said islands, and reprieves for those against the United States, until the decision of the President of the United States thereon shall be made known; and to appoint and commission all officers, civil and of the militia, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

"A secretary of the islands shall also be appointed, who shall hold his office during the term of four years, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States, whose duty it shall be, under the direction of the governor, to record and preserve all the papers and proceedings of the executive and all the acts of the governor and legislative council, and transmit authentic copies of the proceedings of the governor, in his executive department, every six months to the President of the United States. In case of the vacancy of the office of governor, the government of said territory shall devolve on the secretary.

"The legislative powers shall be vested in the governor and in 13 of the most fit and discreet persons of the islands, to be called the legislative council, who shall be appointed annually by the President of the United States from among those holding real estate therein, and who shall have resided one year at least in the said territory and hold no office or profit under the islands or the United States. The governor, by and with the advice and consent of the said legislative council, or a majority of them, shall have power to alter, modify, or repeal the laws which may be in force at the commencement of this act. Their legislative powers shall also extend to all the rightful subjects of legislation; but no law shall be valid which is inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, or which shall lay any person under restraint, burden, or disability on account of his religious opinions, professions, or worship, in all which he shall be free to maintain his own and not be burdened for those of another.

"The governor shall publish throughout the said territory all the laws which shall be made, and shall from time to time report the same to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress, which, if disapproved of by Congress, shall thenceforth be of no force. The governor or legislative council shall have no power over the primary disposal of the soil, or tax the property of nonresidents higher than that of residents, or make any regulation of commerce which shall discriminate between the islands of said archipelago or the ports thereof, or pass any special act creating a corporation, or conferring any right, privilege, or franchise; but said governor and legislative council may pass general laws under which, upon equal terms, corporations may be organized, and such rights, privileges, or franchises may be obtained subject to the authority of Congress or the legislature of said islands to alter, amend, or repeal the same.

"The governor shall convene and prorogue the legislative council whenever he may deem it expedient. It shall be his duty to obtain all the information in his power in relation to the customs, habits, and dispositions of the inhabitants of the said territory and communicate the same from time to time to the President of the United States."

Strike out section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The judicial power in said archipelago shall be vested in a supreme court, courts of first instance, and municipal courts. The chief justice and the associate justices of the supreme court and the judges of the courts of first instance shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and their respective terms of office shall be four years and until their successors are appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President: Provided, That such inferior courts as may be deemed necessary may be established by the authority of the legislature, but whose jurisdiction shall not extend to any case involving the title to real estate, or in which the thing in controversy exceeds in value the sum of $100."

Insert after the word "homes," in line 18, page 4, the following:

"Also the number of deaths which have occurred in said islands since the 1st day of January, 1899, and the causes thereof, and the character and value of property destroyed since said date."

Strike out section 8.

Strike out section 11 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The public land laws of the United States are hereby extended and made applicable to the said archipelago, and citizens of the United States or of said archipelago may make entry thereof and obtain title thereto in accordance with the provisions of said laws, and the United States Philippine Commission is hereby authorized to make rules and regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of said laws to carry the same into effect."

Strike out sections 13, 14, and 15.

Strike out section 67 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the jurisdiction of the several courts herein provided for, both appellate and original, shall be limited by law. Writs of error, bills of exception, and appeals shall be allowed in all cases from the final decisions of said courts of first instance to the supreme court, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law."

"Writs of error and appeals from the final decisions of said supreme court shall be allowed and may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States in the same manner and under the same regulations as from Territorial supreme courts where the value of the property or amount in controversy, to be ascertained by the oath or affirmation of either party or other competent witnesses, shall exceed $5,000; except that a writ of error or appeal shall be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decision of said supreme court created by this act in cases involving the Constitution or any statute or treaty of the United States, or any right, privilege, or immunity claimed thereunder; and except that a writ of error or appeal shall be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decision of said supreme court, or of the court of first instance or any judge thereof, upon any writ of habeas corpus involving the question of personal freedom. And each of said courts of first instance shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction in all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States as is vested in the circuit and district courts of the United States, and writs of error and appeal in all such cases shall be made to the supreme court of said archipelago, the same as in other cases."

Strike out section 95 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That so much of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902,' as vested all military, civil, and judicial powers necessary to govern the Philippine Islands in such person and persons and to be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, and all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act, are hereby repealed."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be printed and lie upon the table.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question in regard to those amendments. As I understand, those amendments are not in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. RAWLINS. No; they are separate amendments.

Mr. LODGE. A series of amendments to different parts of the bill.

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes; a series of amendments.

I now offer, in behalf of the minority of the Committee on the Philippines, the amendment which I send to the desk, in the nature of a substitute, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. LODGE. Is that the amendment already printed in the report of the committee?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes; but I want it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator want it read now?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes; I want it read, so as to go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

SEC. 1. That, subject to the provisions hereinafter set forth, the United States of America hereby relinquish all claim of sovereignty over and title to the archipelago known as the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 2. That the United States shall continue to occupy and govern said archipelago until the people thereof have established a government, and until sufficient guaranties have been obtained for the performance of our treaty obligations with Spain and for the safety of those inhabitants who have adhered to the United States, and for the maintenance and protection of all rights which have accrued under the authority thereof, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 3. That ninety days after the President of the United States shall have proclaimed that all armed resistance to the United States has ceased in said archipelago the United States Philippine Commission shall make and promulgate rules and regulations for the holding of an election in the provinces of said archipelago for members of a convention, which convention when organized shall proceed to the adoption of a constitution for the government of said archipelago. That all male inhabitants of said archipelago 21 years of age and over who speak and write either the English or Spanish languages or any of the native languages of the said archipelago, and who shall have resided therein for one year, shall be qualified to vote for members of the convention, and any person so qualified as an elector shall be qualified to become a member of said convention. The members of the said convention shall number 300, and shall be apportioned by the United States Philippine Commission among the several provinces of said archipelago so that the distribution shall be in proportion to their population as near as may be; and when the said apportionment has been determined upon, the said commission shall by proclamation order an election of the members for said convention, to be held throughout the said archipelago at such time as shall be fixed by the said Commission, which election shall be held not more than one year from the date of the proclamation by the President of the United States hereinbefore provided for, and ample time shall be given before said election to circulate said proclamation throughout said archipelago and arrange for the holding of the said election.

SEC. 4. That the members of the convention thus elected shall meet at the city of Manila on a day to be fixed by the said United States Philippine Commission not more than ninety days subsequent to the day of election, the time for which meeting shall be stated in the proclamation calling attention to the election aforesaid; and after organization the said convention shall proceed to form a constitution and organize such government as they may deem best adapted to promote the welfare and secure the peace and happiness of the inhabitants of said islands: Provided, That said convention shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States:

First. That there shall belong to the United States and continue to be the property thereof such lands and waters as the President of the United States shall designate to the said convention for naval, military, and coaling stations and terminal facilities for submarine cables, the same to continue under the control and sovereignty of the United States.

Second. To carry into effect the treaty obligations of the United States with the Kingdom of Spain, and for the maintenance and protection of all rights and property acquired under the authority of the United States.

Third. That no inhabitant of said archipelago shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her adherence to the United States.

SEC. 5. That when the constitution and government shall be formed for and by the people of said archipelago in compliance with the provisions of this act, the said United States Philippine Commission shall certify the fact to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances, whereupon it shall be the duty of the President to issue his proclamation declaring the independence of the people of said archipelago, and that they constitute an independent state and nation.

SEC. 6. That the President of the United States is hereby requested to negotiate an agreement between the United States, the said Philippine Archipelago, and Great Britain, Germany, France, and such other powers as he may deem best, providing for its perpetual neutrality and inviolability from all foreign interference, and also for equal opportunities of trade to foreign countries with said archipelago.

SEC. 7. That immediately after the President shall have proclaimed that all armed resistance to the United States has ceased in said archipelago, he is requested to proclaim full amnesty to all the inhabitants thereof for or on account of political offenses and the bearing of arms against the United States, and all Filipinos or inhabitants of said archipelago who have been deported shall be returned to the place from whence they were so deported: Provided, That such amnesty shall not apply to any who have violated the rules of civilized warfare or were guilty of murder or torture. That the latter, if any, shall be afforded a speedy trial for their offenses in the civil courts of said archipelago and be punished or acquitted, as the facts and law may warrant.

SEC. 8. That within sixty days from the election of officers under the constitution to be formed by the said Philippine Archipelago and the inauguration of said officers the President shall cause the armed forces of the United States to be withdrawn from said archipelago as speedily as may be, except such forces as may be maintained in such parts thereof as have been retained by the United States for naval, military, and coaling stations and terminal facilities for cables; and the President of the United States and the Secretary of War shall make all needful regulations to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to promote the welfare and establish the independence of the Philippine Islands."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie upon the table.

Mr. CARMACK. I wish to offer two amendments to the pending bill, which I ask to have read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 76 it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That it shall be unlawful for any corporation organized under this act, or for any person, company, or corporation receiving any grant, franchise, or concession from the government of the Philippine Islands, to hold persons in slavery or involuntary servitude, or to use, employ, or contract for the labor of persons so held in slavery or involuntary servitude, and any person, company, or corporation so violating the provisions of this act shall forfeit all charters, grants, franchises, and concessions for doing business in the said Philippine Islands, and in addition shall be deemed guilty of an offense, and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $10,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be ordered to be printed and lie upon the table. The other amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add the following:

That the United States regard with extreme disfavor any movement having for its object the early or ultimate admission of the Philippine Islands as a State or States of the Union: and any action on the part of persons holding office under the authority of the United States that give sanction or encouragement to such a movement is hereby condemned.

That to confer the rights and privileges of citizens upon the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands would tend to destroy the integrity of the citizenship and to degrade the character of the Government of the United States.

That to maintain the relation of sovereign and subject between the Government of the United States and a people under its dominion would be repugnant to the principles of the Constitution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be ordered to be printed, and lie upon the table.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS, ETC.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, and that thirty minutes be now devoted to the consideration of unobjected pension bills and bills to correct military records.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that unobjected pension cases and bills to correct military records may be considered for thirty minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Chair would like to recognize the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] to secure the consideration of a bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] likewise has a little bill. If it does not come out of the thirty minutes, I shall be glad to yield to both Senators.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN UTAH.

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 148) to establish a fish-hatching and fish station in the State of Utah.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $25,000 for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Utah, including purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, at some suitable point to be selected by the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RED LAKE RESERVATION, MINN.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4962) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Red Lake and Pembina bands of Indians of the Red Lake Reservation, Minn., and making appropriation to carry the same into effect.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 6, section 3, after the word "agreement," in line 4, to insert "except sections 16 and 36 of each township, which are hereby granted to the State of Minnesota for school purposes;" so as to read:

SEC. 3. That the lands ceded to the United States under said agreement, except sections 16 and 36 of each township, which are hereby granted to the State of Minnesota for school purposes, shall be disposed of under the general provisions of the homestead and town-site laws of the United States, and shall be opened to settlement and entry by proclamation of the President, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 25, page 6, after the word "law," to insert "shall pay said sum of $3.90 in five annual payments in advance and;" so as to read:

And provided further, That the price of said lands shall be $3.90 per acre, but settlers under the homestead law who shall reside upon and cultivate the land entered in good faith for the period required by existing law shall pay said sum of $3.90 in five annual payments in advance and shall be entitled to a patent for the lands so entered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 3, after the word "officers," to insert "the said five annual payments in advance and of the;" so as to read:

Upon the payment to the local land officers the said five annual payments in advance and of the usual and customary fee and commissions, and no other or further charge of any kind whatsoever shall be required from such settler to entitle him to a patent for the land covered by his entry.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to know whether the officers of the Government who have charge of such matters recommend the adoption of the bill?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir. The report is printed.

Mr. PETTUS. I should like to hear from the principal officer of the Government having charge of the matter. I suppose it is the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; there is a report from him.

Mr. PETTUS. I wish to know that he approves of it. That is the main thing.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that that part of the report be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Commissioner has carefully considered the agreement and has prepared a draft of a bill to ratify and confirm the same.

I also herewith transmit a copy of a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, dated the 3d instant, to whom the matter was referred for report as to the disposition of the coded lands.

The agreement meets with my approval, and I have the honor to recommend that it receive favorable action by the Congress.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. SEYDEL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the first pension case on the Calendar.

The bill (H. R. 5695) granting an increase of pension to John M. Seydel was announced as the first bill in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of John M. WATERS FORMING INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARIES.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to allow me to secure the passage of the joint resolution (S. R. 52) authorizing the President of the United States to invite the government of Canada to join in the formation of an international commission to examine and report upon the diversion of the waters that are the boundaries of the two countries. It is important that it shall be passed by the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator if it does not lead to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Alabama will allow the junior Senator from Maine to make a suggestion, a provision for this commission has been inserted in the river and harbor bill in the House, and has also been reported favorably by the Senate committee, and probably it will be unnecessary to pass the joint resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire, if I may, as the matter has come up, whether the provision retains the proposition to have us invite the government of Canada?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir; the Government of Great Britain.

Mr. HOAR. The original resolve on the Calender, as I called the attention of the Senate to it the other day, proposes to invite the government of Canada, and I thought it was unusual in our diplomatic relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the river and harbor bill it is the Government of Great Britain, and in the joint resolution which the Senator from Alabama called it is also the Government of Great Britain.

Mr. HOAR. All right.

CUBAN RECIPROCITY BILL.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12765.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12765.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12765, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12765) to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if I had been called to prepare a bill to present to this House to accomplish the avowed objects of the pending bill, I would not have presented the measure which we are now considering. The object of this bill, as expressed in its caption and declared by its friends, is "To provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba." It is to obtain the trade of that country through the principle of reciprocity; that is, they shall have our trade and we shall have theirs. This is what is meant by reciprocal trade relations between two countries. Desiring to bring about reciprocal trade relations with Cuba, I would not have presented exactly this measure, and not because it is not a measure starting in the proper direction, for it is; but I would not have stopped exactly where the friends of the pending bill stopped. I would have recommended a reduction of the tariff rates at least 40 per cent instead of 20 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, there have been a variety, a great variety, of opinions developed and expressed during this long debate. It has been an able debate. While I do not agree with all that has been said by gentlemen who advocate the passage of this bill, I do agree with them in the conclusions they reach, that the bill should pass. Certain landmarks, Mr. Chairman, have been established by this debate, fully developed by what has occurred in the House and before the country during its pendency. If nothing else has been established there is one fact settled beyond peradventure, it seems to me, that is of incalculable advantage to the country. What is that? It is that there is a way to provide for and obtain, or to have reciprocal trade relations with, a country by and through appropriate legislation. How is that to be done? Exactly along the line of this bill.

If you want the trade of a people, you must deal fairly with them; if you want them to buy from you, you must buy from them. Therefore, the first step that the wise men took when they commenced to frame this bill was to plant a Democratic landmark from which they can not escape. What is that? Lower your tariff wall and make trade relations freer and fairer. You want to establish relations, you want to develop trade with Cuba. How are you going to do it? Why do you not pursue the Republican policy of placing a higher tariff against Cuba and Cuban tariff? Would not that be the Republican idea? What is the Democratic idea? Reduce your tariff walls, reduce your tariff, and provide for reciprocal trade relations in this way.

So, then, Mr. Chairman, without dwelling upon this important fact, this grand landmark is here planted and definitely established by this debate. Republican leaders must confess hereafter that when we want to provide wider fields for our products, if we want to extend our trade with any country and open new markets, we must pull down the immense tariff wall which surrounds this country. That fact, then, is established. I said that I thought they had started in the proper direction. I said they did not go as far as they ought to have gone, in my judgment. It may be I am mistaken in this. The witnesses differ in view; some gentlemen who testified before the Ways and Means Committee in the long hearings before that Committee before the bill was presented were of opinion that it was necessary that there should be 50 per cent reduction in favor of Cuban products before we would get the trade of the islands. Others said 40 per cent; General Wood, I believe, thought 40 would give it; others 33, and others a still lower sum.

The gentleman who framed the bill must have thought that 20 per cent reduction would give us that trade. Having the honor of a seat on that committee, I concurred in reporting this bill and giving it a favorable recommendation. I did so because, while I doubted, and expressed that doubt when I cast my vote in committee for the bill, that it would accomplish the purpose in view; yet I thought I might possibly be mistaken in this respect, and it would bring about the reciprocal trade between the two countries so earnestly desired. Therefore, without agreeing to the arguments which gentlemen have adduced in favor of the bill, without subscribing in toto to the report made by the learned chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, without indorsing all of the arguments and reasons which constrained him to support the bill, and hoping it might be properly amended in the House, I did agree that the bill should be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Having done that, Mr. Chairman, I owe it to my party associates and possibly to the country to state briefly some of the reasons which constrained me to report the bill favorably. The first reason was that it reduces the outrageously high protective rates, now fixed by the Dingley law upon sugar and all other Cuban products, 20 per cent. Some say that only one industry is chiefly affected. Let us look at it for a moment. It is not only one commodity, but the bill applies to all products coming from Cuba,—sugar, tobacco, and everything else. Sugar we all know is the chief commodity coming from that island. This reduction is not a small matter. How much sugar do we consume? I will not weary you with figures, but the total consumption of sugar in the United States per year is about 2,500,000 tons. How much do we make in the United States? About one-third of this, including Hawaii and Porto Rico. The beet sugar and cane production in this country is about 800,000 tons. Therefore, we must import about two-thirds of the sugar consumed by the American people, or about 1,600,000 tons. Where does it come from? About one-half of it—800,000 tons—comes from Cuba, or will do so this year, and the remaining half, in round numbers, from other countries, mainly from Germany.

Now, then, on one-half of this one article that the American people import for consumption, we get a reduction by this bill of 20 per centum of the present rate. Some say, Mr. Chairman, that that will not affect the price. The principle is that the reduction of tariff duties will lower the price of the imported article in this country. That is a Democratic contention. I do not know how much it will lower it to the consumer, but it is a step in the right direction. The object of lowering the rate is to benefit the consumer in this country, and therefore because the bill reduces the rate of the Dingley tariff upon one of the highest schedules in it, the sugar schedule, for about one-half of the amount consumed—that is, imported into the United States—I believe the bill should pass.

There is another view of the question. Some say they are tired of sentimentalism; but, frown upon that idea as we will, there is a sentiment in the country, and properly, too, that we should do something for these wards, I may almost call them, of the United States in Cuba. I know it is contended by gentlemen on this side of the House that we have done enough for Cuba. There has not been a day, Mr. Chairman, since the beginning of the month of April, 1898, when war was declared by the United States against Spain, that the hand of the United States, the military power of the United States, has not rested with controlling and dominating influence upon the island and the people of Cuba. We are there now. We intend to stay there as long as it is necessary. How long that will be I do not know.

I am not going to discuss the effect of the Platt amendment. My friend from New York, Mr. MCCLELLAN, made a proper statement, as I believe, of the effect of that piece of legislation upon the island. Others have followed. Under the Platt amendment I believe that with the power exerted by it, and by all the surrounding circumstances, over the people of Cuba we may look at them somewhat in the sense of wards.

This bill will give Cuba a 20 per cent advantage. How much it will amount to can be easily figured. Whatever it is, whether it reduces the price of sugar to the American consumer or not, it does benefit the people of Cuba to that extent. It goes beyond that. There are two purposes accomplished, either one of which would be sufficient to control my action in supporting the bill. Of course, in saying this I will add that I do not wish to do violence to any industry in this country. I know that our beet-sugar friends complain that they are going to be uprooted, yet they will tell you that it is not going to affect the price of sugar to the consumer of sugar in the United States. Well, if it is not going to affect the price to the consumer, how will the beet-sugar man be injured? Let us go a little further.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No; I can not yield. I prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. HAMILTON. I simply rose for information; not to have any controversy with the gentleman; I am not given to that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understand that, but I prefer not to yield, for I am not really in a physical condition to make a speech this morning. Mr. Chairman, these two grounds, the reduction of Dingley rates, and the direct pecuniary benefit to Cuba, would be sufficient to constrain me to vote for this bill, but I have not yet reached the main purpose and object of the bill. The bill does not say the object is to reduce the tariff taxation to the people and give pecuniary relief to the island, but it is to enlarge and increase our trade with the island.

Now, will it do that? If there is anything in the world we need, Mr. Chairman, in this country, walled in as we are by the Dingley tariff law, the highest that this country or perhaps any country in the world has ever known, it is extension of trade. This bill has for its main purpose the extension of trade between the people of the United States and the people of Cuba.

I am not going to weary you by reading figures; but I have in my hand a little statement made before the Committee on Ways and Means by one of the most intelligent—I will not say the most intelligent—but one of the fairest, most intelligent, and brightest witnesses who came before that committee, as every member will admit. I refer to Mr. Placé, a merchant and a business man of the city of Habana. He set out in figures in round numbers what the trade to Cuba from this country was last year, and the whole amount of the trade of the island of Cuba with other countries. The imports into that island from all lands amounted to about $66,000,000 last year, as he states. Now, how much of that did we get? Twenty-eight million dollars in round numbers.

Mr. Placé, this intelligent business man and merchant doing business in Habana, says that if we will reduce our tariff taxes we shall get all of the trade of that island instead of about one-third.

Mr. TAWNEY rose.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I prefer not to yield for any interruption, unless I should misrepresent somebody.

Mr. Chairman, this same witness says that with Cuba placated, with her people free, and with anything like a fair degree of prosperity, that inside of two years, instead of importing $66,000,000 worth of foreign goods the island will import $250,000,000 worth. Now, I do not say that; but that is what this witness says, who comes here and gives us the benefit of his opinion.

Of that $66,000,000 worth of trade last year, he takes up the product of rice. We raise rice in this country; and there was imported of rice into Cuba last year from all foreign countries $3,335,721 worth. How much did the United States send there? $3,702 worth.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No; I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. If he will wait till I get through I will then, if I can, yield for any question.

Of cotton goods there are imported into Cuba from all foreign countries $6,084,627 worth. How much of that came from the United States? $447,501 worth.

Of shoes there was imported into Cuba last year from all foreign countries $3,921,167 worth. Of that amount only $879,180 worth came from the United States.

How is it with regard to the importations of beef? Now, if there is anything in the world that we should export to Cuba, it is beef. Last year there was imported into Cuba from all foreign countries $2,224,428 worth, of which we contributed $308,385 worth. Of cattle there was imported into Cuba $7,351,864 worth, of which we gave $1,260,176 worth. Of paper and manufactures from paper, Cuba imported $1,643,738 worth, of which our share was $441,440 worth. The following is the statement in full and in exact figures:

RICE.

From foreign countries	$3,332,019
From United States	3,702
	3,335,721

COTTON GOODS.

From foreign countries	5,637,126
From United States	447,501

This statement shows that the United States furnishes only about one-third of these prime articles, of which we should furnish the whole or almost all, because of our nearness of location and our conveniences for carrying on that trade. These conditions should have enabled us to furnish practically all of these commodities to the people of Cuba. But, according to Mr. Placé, we supply only one-third. With proper reciprocal trade relations, we would supply to them, instead of one-third, almost 90 per cent or possibly 95 per cent. So far as the present bill seeks to accomplish this most worthy object, it commands my support.

While last year the trade of the United States with Cuba—our importations into that island—amounted to $28,000,000, all the witnesses tell us that our trade with the island is growing less year by year. Instead of building up a trade with that island, we are losing the little that we have. This bill promises to give us that field; and, Mr. Chairman, we get it without money and without price; or we get it at our own price, by simply sending to Cuba our goods and taking hers in exchange.

We are expending—as my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who, I see, is standing in the middle aisle and doing me the honor to listen—we are spending, as my friend knows, a hundred million dollars to do something in the Philippine Islands. What we are doing there and what we intend to do he has never told us; no man in the Republican party has ever told us. If it is to benefit this country, it must be by extending our trade relations in the Orient. It must be by developing our trade in the Philippine Islands. One hundred million dollars a year it is costing us; and the entire trade from the Philippine Islands—all the importations and exportations last year—were only about $50,000,000, of which we shared about $5,000,000.

Now, here is a proposition to result soon, we hope, in giving us nearly $250,000,000 per year of trade with a country right at our door, which will not cost us anything—no blood, no tears, no money, nothing except to exchange our commodities with them; yet we are asked to put it aside.

Mr. Chairman, these three reasons, I say, constrain me to give my support to this bill. I have stated very briefly those reasons, for I have not the time or the physical strength to enlarge upon them.

Mr. Chairman, why should we not reduce the tariff? I want to talk about that a moment. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has told us that protection is not a fetish to be worshiped; the Dingley act is not something too holy to be touched. I think, Mr. Chairman, that other gentlemen see the signs of the storm that is coming and that is to affect this country, all because of high protection. The gentleman [Mr. GROSVENOR] says we must not look at this matter of protection as some gentlemen on that side seem to look at it—as a matter too holy to touch. Why, the friends of beet sugar who are opposing this bill say that if you touch this tariff wall at all, it will totter and fall. They claim that they have a promise, written, signed, sealed, and delivered by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. PAYNE], in a speech which he made in favor of the Dingley bill when it was pending before this House, in which he pledged the country and pledged the beet-sugar people that for twenty-five years the tariff should not be molested and should not be touched. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in his speech says it is not so holy that we can not touch it.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if ever there was a time in this country when tariff reform was demanded, this is the time. Why put it off? as asked by my friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] on yesterday. Are we to have a more auspicious time than this? Our treasury is overflowing. There is an outcry in the Northwest, in the South, in the Northeast, and in the Middle States in favor of a revision of many of the schedules in the tariff law. Why not begin it now? The fact that this bill does begin it in a modest way, I have already said, commends it to me, constrains me to give it my support. This matter of protection, Mr. Chairman, ought to be discussed. I am glad that we have had the opportunity to discuss it. The attention of the country is being drawn to it now as perhaps not before in many years.

There are different schools of medicine in this country. There is one called the faith school, and somehow I am constrained to think that a man who is an out and out, thick and thin protectionist has to have more faith than any sick man is required to have in order to be cured by a faith doctor.

Now, what do they say about protection? Let us look at it just for a moment. An ardent protectionist tells you that he wants protection for the benefit of the manufacturers of our country, our infant industries. No matter how old and hoary they are with age, they are infant industries and need protection. These weak infants can not stand alone without protection. The very name is sweet to the ear, has a mellowing influence about it—protection, protection to home industries.

They want protection for the infant industries of this country in order that the manufacturer of goods may get a higher price for his goods, and thus prosper and compete with manufacturers of foreign countries. Is not that his object? What else does the manufacturer wish protective tariffs for? Is it to reduce the price of his goods? If they had that effect, he would not be in favor of protection if he consulted his own interest. His belief is that protection will raise the price of his goods. Now, then, let that be established. Let that be confessed. Let no man gainsay that that is the prime object and the purpose of protection and a protective tariff.

What is the next thing he asks you to believe—I am talking about faith—what is the next thing he asks you to believe? I am prepared to believe that high protection will protect him and give him a higher price for his goods. I accept that, and I think every sensible man in the country will accept it. Well, he says, we must have a protective tariff in order to reduce the price of our goods when they are sold to the consumer who is to buy them.

Now, there are two totally inconsistent provisions. First, he wants a protective tariff to enable him to get a higher price for his goods which he manufactures, and he wants a protective tariff to enable him to sell these same goods more cheaply to the American consumer, or to the consumer wherever he may be. He then goes a little further and says he wants this protection in order to enable him to pay his laborers higher wages to manufacture these goods. Therefore, you have this protective tariff accomplishing three (3) purposes—enabling the manufacturer to get a higher price for his goods, enabling him to pay his laborers higher wages, which we all favor, and at the same time reducing the price of the very article that he is to get a higher price for to the American or other consumer when it is sold.

If you believe all that, I say you have more faith than is necessary to remove a mountain. Faith enough to believe you are well and hearty when you are sick nigh unto death. I believe, therefore, whenever I have an opportunity in this bill or any other to reduce the protective tariff I should vote to do it. I said that General GROSVENOR recognized the fact that there was a storm coming. Yes, and there are other gentlemen on that side of the House who do the same thing—as, for instance, our friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK]. I am sorry he is not in his seat—that is, I do not see him now. But he has presented a measure here which has for its object and purpose a reform and a revision of one of the important schedules of the Dingley tariff law. I think the reason he introduced that bill was that he saw himself that his constituents were demanding of him that these tariff rates provided in that schedule should be reduced. Is there such a demand as that in his district? I don't know whether all of you saw what I read in the paper this morning or not. My friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] yesterday commented upon the action of Mr. BABCOCK in presenting to this House a measure to reduce the tariff tax on this metal schedule. He has a bill here—a bill pending before the Committee on Ways and Means—which has for its object the reduction of the rates on all articles mentioned in this metal schedule. We intend to give him an opportunity and to give every gentleman an opportunity to vote for the amendment provided by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Is there a demand for revision? Let us see if there is, Mr. Chairman. I hold in my hand an article, which I clipped from the morning Post, which contains the action of two counties in the district which my friend from Wisconsin has the honor to represent on this flooor. I read:

[Special to the Washington Post.]

BARABOO, WIS., April 17.

The Sauk County Republicans held a convention here to-day and elected a solid delegation for the renomination of Congressman BABCOCK and adopted a resolution in favor of the bill introduced by Mr. BABCOCK reducing the tariff on steel products. The resolution is as follows:

"The Republicans of Sauk County, in convention assembled, reaffirm their allegiance to the doctrines of the Republican party, believing that the prosperity of the American people depends upon its continuation in power; they declare unequivocally in favor of the bill introduced by their present Representative, the Hon. J. W. BABCOCK, reducing excessive and unnecessary tariff on steel products, and while favoring the fullest protection to every American industry requiring protection, they are heartily in favor of revising all excessive tariff schedules, keeping in view the interests of the American farmer and the laboring man.

"Resolved, That the delegates to the Congressional convention be instructed to cast their ballots for our present Representative, Hon. J. W. BABCOCK."

Mr. Chairman, is there a Democrat, is there a gentleman occupying a seat on this side of the Chamber, who does not subscribe to these resolutions? If so, let him hold up his hand. Is there a Republican on the other side of the Chamber who does not subscribe to this doctrine? The district which Mr. BABCOCK represents yesterday passed the resolution which I have read to you unanimously, as it appears, but that was not all.

I read from the clipping referred to a further resolution:

The Republicans of Iowa County, in Mr. BABCOCK's district, met in convention yesterday and appointed delegates and instructed them for his renomination, and passed resolutions indorsing his position in reducing the tariff on steel products.

Now, that is what we should do. That is exactly what we purpose doing when this bill is reached under the five-minute rule. Can we have any aid from the Republican side? I have in my hand here a copy of the bill which the Republicans in Mr. BABCOCK's district in two counties yesterday unanimously indorsed and commended him for presenting to this House. I shall tender that, if he does not, as an amendment to the pending bill.

I shall summon the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] if I can with my weak power, and every other gentleman on that side of the House, to come to the support of the measure to give to his constituents the relief which they declared for on yesterday. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not only that, but we will present other amendments. I have not time to go into all of them now. We will present the amendment, if it is not presented by some other gentleman, to take off the differential duty on refined sugar. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] referred to that yesterday, and in his able and attractive argument assumed, possibly, that the Chair would decide that that amendment was not in order. I am here to say I have faith, I have confidence, not only in the ability, but in the fairness of the gentleman who occupies the chair at this time as chairman of the Whole—I do not believe that he will hold that that amendment is not in order. We intend to see that it is presented to this House.

Gentlemen say we can not vote for this bill because it gives something to the sugar trust. They are afraid that this 20 per cent reduction will not go to the people of Cuba; that it will not go to the American consumer, but that the sugar trust will get the benefit of it. It is possible that they will get some benefit from it. I am not here to gainsay that, but I am here to say by passing this differential amendment we can take from the sugar trust five or six millions of dollars and leave it to the American consumer. I believe it is in order. I won't take time to argue that now. I hope to do it under the five-minute rule. I expect to show, Mr. Chairman, that the ablest Republican parliamentarian who ever presided over this House, one of the ablest, if not the ablest, parliamentarian that ever presided over any house, has made a precedent for the amendment. I refer to Mr. Blaine, a man whom, while we may have differed with him on this side of the House upon political questions, all conceded him to be a parliamentarian of parliamentarians. I believe the able chairman will follow the ruling of Mr. Blaine and hold that the amendment is in order. Then, if we want to take something from the sugar trust for the benefit of American consumers of sugar that they are supposed to get by 20 per cent reduction in this bill, all we have to do is to repeal this differential tax and give the benefit to the American consumer.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will excuse me.

Mr. BROMWELL. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he was in favor of taking the differential off all sugar, or merely Cuban sugar?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Off all sugar.

Mr. Chairman, I said a variety of opinions had been expressed. I have a number of amendments that I propose to offer; but my time has about expired, and I will not have time now to discuss them. I can only mention them, or some of them. I have said we are ready to cooperate with the gentleman from Wisconsin in reducing the tariff on the metal schedule of the Dingley bill; we are ready to cooperate with the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and his associates on that committee in making a slight reduction on the sugar schedule of the Dingley bill. We are ready to join in the reduction of other schedules, not with a view to destroy the business interests of the country but with the object of making a fair and moderate reduction of the present high protection rates.

On behalf of the Democratic side of the House I shall offer at the proper time amendments to bring about a moderate reduction in tariff rates. There is no good reason why there can not be at the present session of Congress a revision of the tariff in the interest of the laboring and producing classes of the country. The Republicans have a clear majority in both the Senate and the House, and have the Presidency. They can make the revision. There is time now for such legislation. But the edict has gone forth that there is to be no tariff bill, or relief measure of any kind or character considered or passed during this Congress. This being true we shall ask that an amendment be placed upon this bill here and now making a general reduction in tariff rates. If the opportunity be given us we will offer the following amendment:

That on and after the 1st day of July, 1902, the duties levied on the articles named in the present tariff law, imported from foreign countries, shall be reduced 25 per cent.

This will give prompt relief in some degree at least to the country. I do not insist that this is the wisest form of tariff legislation to take, but when it is apparent that nothing else is to be done, it is a means that in my opinion can be safely adopted.

If that amendment should fail, then if opportunity is given I will offer the following amendments and pledge to them the support of the Democratic side of the House:

(1) That when it is shown to the satisfaction of the President and Secretary of the Treasury that articles and commodities are manufactured and controlled or produced in the United States by a trust or trusts, the importation of such articles and commodities from foreign countries shall be free of duty until in the opinion of the President and Secretary of the Treasury such manufacture, controlled, or production shall have ceased.

(2) That when it is shown to the satisfaction of the President and Secretary of the Treasury that any article or commodity which is manufactured in the United States is sold in a foreign country more cheaply that the price at which the same article or commodity is sold in the United States, the rate of duty on such article or commodity shall be reduced by the President and Secretary of the Treasury 50 per centum of the present rate, or to such extent as to prevent the continuance of such irregularity and injustice, and remove the indirect tariff bounty which promotes the same.

(3) That all wood pulp suitable for or adapted to the manufacture of printing paper, and all printing paper suitable for or adapted to the printing of newspapers, periodicals, or books, all materials and ingredients used in manufacturing the same, when imported into the United State, shall be exempt from duty.

These and similar amendments will be offered, and, although they may all be declared out of order and a vote upon them refused by a rigid construction of the rules of the House, it would be very easy for those in power to make them in order. When the pending bill was being considered by the Ways and Means Committee the foregoing amendments and others of like nature were offered by the Democratic minority and were promptly voted down by the Republican majority. They could all have been placed on the pending bill. It is not yet too late. The desire or inclination to do so on their part is all that is wanting.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] the other day was interesting in some of his illustrations. I said just now, before he came upon the floor, that I thought he had recently discovered that there was a necessity for a revision of many of the high-tariff schedules. I think he said as much when he said that the protective tariff law to-day was not a fetich to be worshiped. He spoke of the changes in the minds of many members upon the floor, and he made a very apt description of those changes by quoting from a comic summer opera, "The Black Hussar."

In this opera there is a character, an innkeeper on the frontiers of Russia, in a great war between that country and France. He said that this innkeeper had in his hotel or inn a frame upon which there was a picture of Napoleon on one side and a Russian Cossack on the other; and that this picture frame revolved, so that when the Russians were advancing into his village the innkeeper could display to them the Russian cossack; and, on the other hand, when the French soldiers were advancing, he could reverse his machine and disclose the picture of that great soldier, Napoleon.

I thought it was an apt illustration, and in view of the fact that the gentleman knew when a storm was approaching and prepared for it, I think he must have had himself in mind when he drew that picture. Now, I do not believe he is going to see any storm this session in favor of a reduction of the wool tariff. He can not conceive that there is a demand in Ohio or anywhere in this country for a revision of the wool schedule. What he sees is the storm that is arising over the metal schedule in the district represented by my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK]. He sees the storm all over this country in favor of free wood pulp, free hides, and reduction of tariff duties generally; he sees the storm in this country, where the people are arising and attacking this octopus, protection, because of the immense advantage it gives to trusts and manufacturers, and which enables them to sell their products in foreign countries more cheaply than they sell at their own doors to our own people. The people of this great Republic will not tolerate this inequality and this injustice much longer. Therefore, in his fertile imagination he drew a picture of this inn keeper with the French soldier and the Russian cossack.

The gentleman from Ohio must have had himself in mind when he made that picture, and I can not help but think of another picture. I think he is preparing for the storm which is soon to come, and which will sweep over this country like an immense prairie fire. Then he will say, "I told you, gentlemen, that the Dingley law was no fetich to be worshiped; I told you that it was not unholy to lay hands on this protective-tariff system, but you would not do it."

He will be prepared for the storm. He will be in a position of a certain great king of East Anglia that I once read of, and I will add I read it in a Sunday-school book many years ago. This East Anglia king, I forget his name, but I believe it was Raedwald, but will not be certain, was a heathen, and some good missionaries went to his country and preached the doctrine of Christianity. This king became converted from his heathenism and his worship of idols and his idol god to Christianity. He determined to try to follow the Lowly Nazarene, and he became converted in thought and belief. But he was not very sure about his new position. He was a little afraid that he might be mistaken. He feared, too, his old heathen idol might turn from his elevation and tear him to pieces. Though he had embraced the new religion he wished to be ready to take advantage of the old, if necessary. He wanted to keep himself ready for a storm. In his doubt and uncertainty he had erected for himself, in his castle, a large moveable picture, something like the one the gentleman from Ohio described, and he put upon one side of the frame the most horrid and ugly picture that could be painted, an exact representation of his heathen idol that he had been worshiping, and on the other side he had painted a beautiful and lovely picture of Jesus. And there he was constantly living in fear lest this idol should turn upon him and rend and destroy him because he had abandoned him and embraced the religion of Jesus Christ. He had his picture ready, and by a simple touch of the crank or handle, he could expose either side. He then placed on the pedestal just under the pictures the Latin maxim or motto Ad utrumque paratus, or "ready for either." I would not have to interpret this Latin for the benefit of the gentleman from Ohio, but possibly I might for some other gentleman who reads these remarks, and I therefore translate it.

That is the position of my friend from Ohio. [Laughter and applause.] He stands with his old god, protection, on one side, and his new god, tariff revision, on the other side, and under it he has his Latin motto, Ad utrumque paratus. The gentleman from Ohio is ready for either one that comes. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I could talk longer, but I have said about all that I wish to say. I have very briefly declared that I would vote for this bill, for the three reasons I announced in the beginning. I have nothing further to add except this, that it is a step in the direction of wider and freer trade between this country and Cuba. Like the gentleman from Ohio, I want to be prepared for the great storm that is to come in this country, and which will come this year or next year or the year following, in which all the protective duties, higher now than they ever were before in this country, will be lowered somewhat, and then we will have freer and wider trade with all the nations of the earth. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. BROMWELL. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BROMWELL. Just one moment, Mr. Chairman, until the gentleman can answer a question. I want to ask him in regard to the alleged bargain between the leaders of the Republican side and the Democratic side for votes for this bill on the condition that the Crumpacker resolution should be smothered. Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Absolutely nothing. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to support this bill, and briefly I will state my reasons. In the first place, it is a plain violation of the principles of the Republican party. In accepting the nomination in my district in 1898 and 1900, I pledged myself to the people of my district to stand squarely upon the Republican platform. It is well known to the members of this House what that platform pledged the Republican party to do.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, in my opinion, strikes a telling blow at the farmers of my district and the sugar manufacturers of the United States. To-day the farmers reap a greater benefit from this crop that they are raising (sugar beet) than any other crop raised in my State. To illustrate in my plain and simple way the enormous crop raised in the State of Michigan last year, I want to show you what I have put into figures in this way: The beets produced in the State of Michigan for the year 1901, if put into one train load of 30 tons to the car, would make a train 325 miles long. Over 66,000 acres of land were planted to beets in the State of Michigan last year, which, if put into one immense strip of land, would make a strip 105 miles long and a mile wide.

Let me say to you that by this beet crop, corn, oats, and wheat, which are the principal crops of the farmers of the State of Michigan, have been diverted. In raising beets it gives a crop they can take to market and get the cash for, and consequently there have been more mortgages canceled in the State of Michigan in the past three years on account of the beet crop than in any previous three years in a quarter of a century. There is not a farmer in the Eighth district of Michigan, which I have the honor to represent, who has in one single instance said to me that they were in favor in any way of this proposition. On the other hand, I have had hundreds of letters protesting against the passage of this bill, both from Democrats and Republicans alike.

I want to say to the gentlemen on the Committee of Ways and Means that not one particle of evidence was presented to that committee by one single Cuban. Every man who came before that committee came in the interest of some American citizen who owns sugar interest in Cuba or who was influenced by the sugar trust, in my opinion. Mr. Mendoza and Mr. Place both have personal interests. Mr. Mendoza owns a little pinkey-dinkey farm of only 27,000 acres. Certainly he had some interest in the matter. I want to call your attention to a few instances where the money will go if this bill becomes a law.

According to the testimony presented to that committee, Mr. Hugh Kelley, of New York, has a factory or plantation in Cuba which produces 12,000 tons of sugar, and a 20 per cent reduction would yield to that gentleman, who is hungry and starving and almost in desperation, $90,600. That is all Hugh Kelly will get out of it. [Laughter.] The Trinidad Sugar Company, of which Mr. Atkins is manager and president, produces, according to his own statement, 10,000 tons of sugar, and that company would get $75,500 only. Then comes Mr. Atkins's own property, which produces 12,000 tons, and he would get $90,600 at a 20 per cent reduction. Then comes that of the Homiguiero estate, representing an estate held by New York parties, which produces 12,000 tons, and they would get $90,600. Then comes the Constance estate, owned by gentlemen in the State of Louisiana. They produce 20,000 tons, on which they would get $151,000. That is all! Then comes the United Fruit Company; according to the statements of Mr. Atkins they have a plantation producing 20,000 tons, and they would get $150,000.

A friend of mine, Mr. Tompson, ex-mayor of the city of Detroit, stated to me a few days ago that a friend of his is a stockholder in the United Fruit Company, and had said to him a few days before that they owned 60,000 acres of sugar lands in Cuba; that they had a plant that cost them $1,000,000, and they paid their manager the insignificant sum of $40,000 per year! Poor suffering Cubans living in Boston in $1,000,000 houses! [Laughter and applause.] This is the kind of people who are going to be helped by the passage of this bill.

Then comes the Chapara Sugar Company, of which ex-Representative Hawley is a member and in which certain New York parties hold an interest. The statement before the Ways and Means Committee is to the effect that they produce 30,000 tons, on which they would get only $226,500.

Then comes Mr. Craig, of Philadelphia, producing 15,000 tons, on which he would get $113,250.

Then comes this poor suffering Cuban, Mendoza, with a Cleveland badge upon him. The gentlemen know, I presume, that the Cleveland badge is a patch 6 by 8 on the seat of his pantaloons. He produces 25,000 tons, on which the amount received would be $188,750.

There is no question that the statements made by all these men before the committee were conservative, and according to those statements this crowd produces 150,000 to 200,000 tons of the 615,000 tons produced last year in Cuba; so that one-sixth of this money would go to these men living in the United States.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] read here in the course of his speech a letter from Governor Wood, of Cuba, in which it was stated that there were only 3,000 tons of sugar in Cuba in the hands of the sugar trust; that the balance was in the hands of the banks, who hold that sugar for the small cane raisers.

That was the statement, or words to that effect. From that statement you are to infer that the banks are carrying this sugar until such time as it can be marketed, so that they may receive the benefit of the provisions of this bill—carrying it for them and charging interest at the rate of 18 to 25 per cent per annum on their money. That is the rate of interest those men down there pay. Now, let me say to you that the small cane raiser in Cuba does not own a solitary cent's worth of that sugar. He mortgages his crop the very minute he begins to raise it, just as the negro in the South does his cotton crop, and by the time the cane is delivered at the factory the raiser has consumed his share of the money. He receives from the factory for his share one-half of the sugar, and the factory receives the balance; and the statement of General Wood is to the effect that in Habana the warehouses are filled to the top and the sugar is piled up along the street, waiting for this bill to become a law. Of this 20 per cent do you suppose that the poor cane raiser has any interest? It is absurd to suppose so. Every man that testified before the committee admitted that he has made money out of the sugar industry in Cuba.

Now, let me read you an affidavit of George W. Ames, of Bay City, Mich.:

G. W. Ames, of Bay City, Mich., U. S. A., being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

On February 27, 1902, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, I met at the Hoffman House, New York City, Mr. M. Mendoza, of Habana, Cuba, and remained with him about one-half hour in the Hoffman House cafe. In company with Mr. Mendoza was Mr. Otto Bush, who introduced me to Mr. Mendoza. Mr. Mendoza stated to me, in Mr. Bush's presence, that anyone who bought land in Cuba with the intention of growing sugar could make a very handsome profit no matter whether any concession in the existing tariff on sugar was granted by the United States or not, and he emphasized the statement in the strongest possible manner.

Pay attention to that statement, if you please.

That land there he had purchased very recently for $2 an acre could not now be purchased for less than $4 an acre; that a great many of his New York friends have very recently purchased large tracts of land, believing that the existing tariff rates on sugar would be granted of 33⅓ per cent. He stated they had asked for 40 per cent, but that they were sure of getting 33⅓ per cent.

During our conversation Mr. Bush, in the presence of Mr. Mendoza and myself, stated that he supposed the sugar trust controlled the press of the East. Mr. Mendoza said in reply, "Yes, we have the press for the East."

"We have the press for the East." How did they get it? Who paid for it—Mr. Mendoza, one of those poor devils suffering so much down there in Cuba, or the sugar trust, or who? I leave that for you to guess.

Mr. Mendoza stated again that where good land was purchased in Cuba at present prices and a sugar plant erected a great deal of money could be made, and this could be done even if there was no concessions made by the United States.

GEORGE W. AMES.

Sworn to before me this 28th day of February, 1902.

DONALD FINDLEY,
Notary Public, New York County, No. 126.

That is what Mr. Mendoza said after he had been here and appealed to the gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee for relief. Either he made false statements before the committee or he was not honest in the statement I have just quoted. Which do you give him credit for? In the interview which I have just read he was trying to encourage capital to go to Cuba for investment. So much for that.

Mr. Chairman, the other day, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] was speaking, I asked him a question (perhaps rather disrespectfully), when he had been speaking of the effort he had been making in favor of tariff measures. He said that he had been a protectionist from his father's knee. When I said to him, "You are doing the very thing now that you ought not to do," or words to that effect, he went at me like some men go at a mountain lion, with blood in his eye—he squashed me quick. He said to me, "You are taking a course that would strike down the industry that you are assuming to protect." There was loud applause on the Republican side.

In the name of God, what did you applaud him for? He is a protectionist on the one hand, in my opinion, and a free trader on the other. He is like an old root doctor I heard of once who went to see a man who was sick with the ague. He fixed up two glasses of medicine and he said to the wife of the man, "Give this for fever and that for the chills." "But," she said, "Doctor, they are both alike; I saw you scrape the bark off that root and put the same bark in each glass." "Oh, but you did not notice how I did it," said the doctor. "This for the chills I scraped up on the root, and that makes it high-cockalorem; and that for the fever I scraped down on the root, and that makes it low-cockahirum; don't you see?" [Prolonged laughter.]

That is free trade on the one hand and protection on the other, my friends.

Let me say to you, gentlemen who favor this bill, the argument that has been made in this House puts you in about the same position that an Irishman once was when he found himself in the second story of a hotel that was on fire. He woke up in the night and said to his partner, "Begorra, Pat, we are done for now; the hall is all on fire, and there is no way to escape except through the window." "Well, get on your clothes quick and we will jump out of the window." In his hurry to dress, Pat got his pants on with the buttons behind. He swung out of the window and let himself fall. His partner listened and he heard him thrashing among the boxes and rubbish below. He said to him, "Pat, are you dead?" By that time Pat had felt of himself to see how badly he was hurt, and he found the buttons of his trousers behind. "No, Jim, I am not dead, but I want to tell you I am surely knocked out; I am mortally twisted." [Prolonged laughter.]

Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] tell me, in the name of all that is reasonable, how my action will in any way injure any American or American industry? He can not do it.

In recording my vote against this bill, I enter my protest against the reduction of the tariff on an article produced in our own country, by which protection is given directly to the farmers. The bone and sinew of the country is the farmer.

You say free trade is death to the American institutions, but if taken in doses of 20 per cent it is a stimulant. How absurd.

Mr. E. F. Atkins, of Boston, who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means in behalf of his own personal interests and that of Cuban planters, stated that there were some 15,000 small cane planters in Cuba suffering for the want of relief in the way of a reduction of our tariff on Cuban goods coming to the United States; but, gentlemen, you must not forget the 17,000 farmers in the State of Michigan that are raising beets. They, too, want your kind consideration in this matter.

I will now illustrate to you the great importance of this beet crop in my State by giving you some figures, as follows, and I ask your kind and careful attention as I read:

Number of farmers contracting with the 13 factories in Michigan now in operation, year of 1901, 16,848; acres planted in 1901 to beets, 66,400; average acreage per farmer, 4, or 104 square miles of land; average tons of beets raised per acre, 9, or a total of 597,600 tons raised in Michigan last year, which would make a train 302 miles long; average per cent of sugar in beets, 14.1; price paid to farmers, $4.50 per ton for 12 per cent sugar and 33⅓ cents for each additional 1 per cent sugar in the beets; average price to farmers, $5.20 per ton. The total amount paid to farmers for 1901 crop was $3,107,520; people or hands employed in raising this crop, 33,000; men employed in each factory of 500 tons capacity, 236; annual pay roll, $69,670; total number of men employed in the 13 factories in operation, about 3,000, with an annual pay roll of $905,000.

The average annual supplies for sugar factories compose the following items and the cash value of the same:

Coal, each factory, at $2.50 per ton	$24,150
Lime rock, 3,220 tons, at $2 per ton	6,440
Coke, 354 tons, at $5.25 per ton	1,855
Sulphur	470
Filter cloth	1,252
Oils	500
Waste	78
Chemicals	1,855
Osmose	760
Sugar bags	1,737
Cooperage stock	6,355
Barrel linings	603
Stationery, etc	2,500
Total	48,590

Average output of sugar per ton of beets in Michigan this year is 210 pounds, or a total of 125,496,000 pounds, or 62,748 tons, which makes 4,183 car loads of 15 tons to the car, which would make a solid train load of sugar over 31 miles long. And this industry is only in its infancy in our State and, in fact, the United States. There will be in 1902, if let alone, 200,000,000 pounds produced in Michigan.

The value of this sugar at 4½ cents per pound, crop of 1901, is $5,647,320, and for the crop in the United States, estimated at 186,000 tons, is $16,740,000.

The advocates of the proposed reduction of the sugar tariff say we destroyed Cuba's market in Spain. That statement is not correct. I read from official reports:

Cuba's crop for—	Tons.	Exported to United States.		Exported to Spain.
		Tons.	Per cent.	Tons.	Per cent.
1893	815,897	680,642	or 83	9,448	or 1⅛
1894	1,054,214	965,524	or 91	23,295	or 2⅛
1895	1,004,286	769,958	or 76	28,428	or 2⅞
1896	225,231	235,659	over 104	9,969	or 4⅘
1897	212,051	202,703	or 95	1,337	or ⅕

By this it can be seen that the United States took nearly all of Cuba's sugar.

Cuba's imports and exports as shared by the United States and other countries during 1900.

Countries.	Per cent of imports sold to Cuba.	Per cent of exports purchased by Cuba.
United States and possessions	45	68
United Kingdom and possessions	16	12
Spain	14½	2
France	5	2½
Germany	4½	11
All other countries	15	4½
Total	100	100

By this it will be seen that we purchased from Cuba nearly 34 per cent more of her products than she purchased from us.

In 1894 Cuba raised her largest crop of sugar, 1,054,214 gross tons, the most ever raised in one year of her history, and the United States purchased of this crop 91 per cent, and Spain purchased but 2½ per cent.

If the beet-sugar manufacturers would make raw or brown sugar only and let the sugar trust do the refining we would never hear a peep from the trust through our friend Mr. Thurber, of New York, about the poor Cuban planters.

The Export Company says: "With a lower rate of tariff on sugar the farmer will make jam, preserves, and jelly." Gentlemen, if the tariff is reduced 20 per cent the sugar trust will make jam and jelly of the beet-sugar men.

Let the tariff alone for a few years and we will become skilled in the sugar business and can compete with the world, and at the same time build up the greatest agricultural industry in the world.

In the United States the consumption of sugar during the year of 1900 was 2,486,228 tons of 2,000 pounds each. The annual rate of increased sugar consumption in this country for the past nineteen years has been 6.34 per cent. At this rate of increase, the amount of sugar used in the United States in 1910 will be 4,062,496 tons, or, in round numbers, 4,000,000 tons. The cane area in our country is able to produce not to exceed 1,000,000 tons annually. This leaves 3,000,000 tons which can be furnished from home-grown beets, if tariff legislation remains favorable during the intervening years. Europe, with much less available beet area than the United States, produced in 1900 5,950,000 tons of beet sugar. If Europe can produce beet sugar, we can, if given an opportunity.

To produce 3,000,000 tons of beet sugar annually would require 600 plants, each having a daily capacity of 500 tons of beets. These plants would represent the following investment and annual business:

Investment in plants	$300,000,000
Working capital	50,000,000
Acres of beets	3,000,000
Valuation of land growing crop	150,000,000
Tons of beets	27,000,000
Tons of sugar	3,000,000
Value of beets	135,000,000
Annual pay roll for labor in factories	42,000,000
Tons coal used annually	5,500,000
Tons lime rock used annually	1,890,000
Tons coke used annually	208,000
Freight paid railroads annually	27,000,000
Annual payments for bags and barrels	6,000,000
Farmers' families raising beets	750,000
Men employed in factories	125,000
Men employed raising beets during season	1,200,000

An industry with such possibilities can be established in the United States within the next ten years. The entire question depends upon tariff legislation. Leave the tariff as it is and the industry is assured. Remove it and this is impossible. Will this gigantic industry be allowed to thrive and enhance the entire agricultural interests of the country, permeating every avenue of business, or will it be destroyed and the sugar market of the United States be surrendered to a trust, whose policy is dictated by one man? If permitted to thrive, the competition between these 600 beet-sugar factories will ultimately reduce the price of sugar far below the price it would reach if controlled by a single corporation. Such reduction will come gradually, as the development of the business under keen competition will justify. The beet-sugar industry stands to-day at the turning point. The trust recognizes this fact and is putting forth every effort to crush the industry. Will Congress stand for the people or the trust? Let me read an extract from the platform of the Republican party, adopted at St. Louis, Mo., June 18, 1896:

PROTECTION FOR SUGAR GROWERS.

We condemn the present Administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country. The Republican party favor such protection as will lead to the production on American soil all the sugar which the American people use, and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

All parties advocating reduction have stated that labor is very scarce in Cuba and wages high for Cuban labor.

None complain about 1901 prices, but say they fear the future.

Mr. Atkins stated that we destroyed Cuba's government and gave them nothing in return. Do such remarks come from a patriotic American? I say, no!

Mr. Kelley, of New York, made so little of our beet-sugar industries as to say it supplied the people of the United States but one day in the year. He made a great mistake, for Louisiana produces 350,000 tons of cane sugar and the United States about 186,000 tons of beet sugar. Our insular possessions produced 500,000 tons, or a total of over 1,000,000 tons out of a total consumed of 2,360,585 long tons estimated for 1901.

So you can see that with what sugar is produced in the United States, 500,000 tons, we supply our people seventy-seven and one-third days in the year. The beet sugar supplies us for twenty-three and one-fifth days in each year, or 23⅕ times as much as figured by Mr. Kelley. We supply about 21 per cent of all consumed.

It has been stated that one-eighth only of sugar land in Cuba is now planted. If that is so, give more favorable conditions and they will produce 6,400,000 tons.

We do not sell Cuba cotton goods, because we do not make the kind they use. Germany does, however, and gets their trade on cotton.

Regardless of imports from Hawaii and Porto Rico our imports of sugar for the year 1901 were 1,360,585 tons of 2,240 pounds and would make 90,705 carloads of 15 tons to a car, or a train 687 miles long.

Do we want to wipe out our home production and make this train 253 miles longer? Others may, but I do not?

Permit me to call your attention to the following:

Beet-sugar product of Europe.

	Tons of 2,240 pounds.
1870	900,000
1880	1,810,000
1890	2,780,000
1900	5,532,000

Beet-sugar product of the United States.

	Tons of 2,240 pounds.
1892	12,018
1895	29,220
1897	40,399
1900	76,859
1901	186,000

Beet-sugar product of Michigan.

	Pounds.
1898, 1 factory	5,271,406
1899, 9 factories	23,192,873
1900, 10 factories	53,661,265
1901, 13 factories	125,496,000
1902, 17 factories (estimated)	195,501,600

No new factories have been contracted for since this tariff agitation began. Please do not overlook that important fact.

Seven or eight million dollars was paid by Michigan consumers in 1898 for foreign sugar. Five million six hundred and forty-seven thousand three hundred dollars was received by Michigan in 1901 for her own sugar crop. This year we will produce more than we will consume, and therefore will keep all that money at home.

The sugar trust fixes the price it pays for sugar in Cuba. They fix the price sugar sells for here and the beet and sugar-cane producers of the United States must and do come to sugar-trust prices.

Last fall sugar was sold west of Missouri River by the trust for 3½ cents per pound. Why was this done? For the sole purpose of driving out home production. The trust managers are moving heaven and earth to accomplish the destruction of this industry.

The Republicans and Democrats alike in the 1900 campaign howled "Down with the trusts." Did you mean it, gentlemen? If so, now is the time to down a trust.

If the benefit will go to the consumer, why not remove the duty on refined sugar. Oh, no. Mr. Place says, "Leave that alone." A sugar-trust proposition.

There are millions of capital in this country awaiting the opportunity, but must have protection or no investments will be made.

What industry in the United States is now suffering for want of a better market in Cuba? None that I know of.

Our importations of sugar for year of 1901 were from—

	Tons.
Germany, beet sugar	225,000
East Indies, cane sugar	300,000
British West Indies, cane sugar	110,000
South Africa, cane sugar	100,000
Cuba, cane sugar	580,000
From all other countries	285,000
Total	1,600,000

Reciprocity means let in goods from foreign countries that we do not produce if that country will take our goods in exchange.

In conclusion, gentlemen, I appeal to you to stand by Republican principles, which is protection to American industries against foreign, cheap labor products. Charity begins at home. Come with us and help to hold up the arm of the American farmer and American laboring man, and while doing this we protect the American manufacturer.

The balance of trade with Cuba is now, and has been for the past three years, against us to the extent of about $11,000,000 annually. What more can Cuba ask of us in justice? I say nothing. If Cubans are suffering we must help them, but not at the expense of the American farmer. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, we are told by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that "our relations with the island of Cuba are peculiar." I quite agree with him on that proposition, but, sir, it seems to me that there are a great many things connected with this bill that are also "peculiar."

It is well known that on the 20th of May next Cuba will start on a new career; that as an independent republic it will take its place among the nations of the world.

There is no desire on the part of any patriotic American other than that the most prosperous and glorious destiny shall attend the future career of the new republic.

We, as a nation, have performed our duty in freeing Cuba from a brutal oppressor, have relieved it from the bondage of subjection, and now, at a somewhat belated date, it is true, we are to leave it to stand alone, a free and independent nation in every way except—and, sir, these exceptions make all our claims that we make Cuba free and independent a hollow mockery. Still, we permit the people of Cuba to go through the formality of organizing a government and to play at having a stable, independent, and free nation, while with the limitations we enforce upon them they can never rise above a dependency of the United States.

For years past "protection" has been the rallying cry of the Republican party; and the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill, who drank in protection from the columns of the New York Tribune in the days when it was a great newspaper; who had a part and share in the framing of the McKinley bill, and also stood as one of the sponsors of the Dingley tariff bill; he, who has been a most ardent protection advocate, now comes to us and, with face turned back on all his previous history, strikes a blow at the policy of protection, so long and forcibly championed by him. Now, I gladly welcome this gleam of reason shown by him, and wish it was only lasting, or that it would extend to the American home industries and not waste all its sweetness on our neighbor. I wonder, though, that his sleep is not disturbed by the hideous bugaboo of free trade. True, this bill is not a free-trade measure, only 20 per cent of free trade.

This is heralded as an Administration measure, and because it is such the Republican leaders are willing to turn aside from their former alleged convictions, nullify their previous records, and forget the big words they have uttered hitherto. This, however, has not been a difficult task for them. Consistency is the least and rarest among the qualities of Republican leaders.

The situation is peculiar. There are the friends of the committee bill who have no hesitancy in "going it blind" when the Administration sets the pace; then there are those who want a larger cut, and there are also a very respectable minority who declare that they are the only consistent Simon-pure Republicans, believing and advocating that the Dingley tariff bill be not changed. These last are true protectionists and want their interests protected, and fear that if the rocky wall of protection be weakened 20 per cent, it will not be long before the whole wall tumbles into ruin.

The chairman pleads for and claims there is necessity for a reduction of 20 per cent in rates on sugar imported from Cuba into the United States. And what are his reasons, what his arguments? Disclaiming any sentiment, he says that, having set Cuba up in housekeeping and business, we must, in fact, it is our duty, to do what we can to make the experiment successful.

We have rescued Cuba from Spain, renovated the cities, and made them clean and healthful; built railroads, making transportation cheaper; put millions of money in circulation in the island; started enterprises that require so much labor that sufficient laborers can not be found, and so increased wages that the laboring population of the island have never in all their history been so well-to-do and prosperous. All this we have done as a nation at the cost of many lives and expense of many millions, besides entailing upon us the Philippine problem, and yet there are some individuals among them who are dissatisfied and want us to discriminate against other nations, as well as our own people, and give them special opportunities in our own home market. This is the full purport and purpose of this bill.

Hampered and liable to be thwarted by a number of Republican members, fearing defeat, the chairman of the committee calls upon Democrats to come to his relief and assist him to pass the bill. Knowing the opposition of the Democratic party to any tariff but for revenue only, he appeals to us for aid in breaking the Dingley high tariff bill in one section alone. The Administration and the Committee on Ways and Means having put the Republican party in a hole, Democratic assistance is wanted to help them out.

Now, I would ask the members on this side of the Chamber, are any of you willing to antagonize the interests of a large number of American industries to please a trust, to help the Administration leaders to pay their political debts? Will you hang on the rear steps of the Republican band wagon or follow at the tail end of the Republican fire department? Will you sacrifice the good of the American people for the benefit of a trust, simply because the committee bill, in a measure, throws a sop to Democratic principles.

I sympathize with Cuba, and my hopes are that this young Republic may prosper and increase. I advocated armed interference in her behalf. I contended that this Government should intervene and drive the Spaniard from the Western Hemisphere and set Cuba free.

The leaders on the Republican side to-day, the advocates for this pretended Cuban relief bill, in 1898 sat silent in their seats and throttled free speech in the defense of Cuba upon this floor month after month, and now they want to pose as friends of Cuba.

The same hand that held them back when the expression of encouragement would have been of material aid to the Cubans is now pushing this bill.

I sympathize with Cuba, and am not indifferent to her needs. I am in favor of giving the people of that country every aid that we can, but I do not believe in doing so to the detriment of the people of my own land.

Cuba may be a subject for charity, but "charity should begin at home."

The advocates of this bill have represented affairs in Cuba as being in a desperate condition, and deceived many. From their statements I had been led to believe that the people were nearing starvation, yet the true facts in the case are these: "While the masses of Cuba are not actually suffering from lack of food, the planters and business men are on the verge of collapse and bankruptcy, and are anxiously hoping for concessions in the United States tariff." This is the statement of one who within the past month has been through the island of Cuba.

It is financial distress that seems to be threatened, and to relieve which we are asked to pass this bill; but there arises the fact that it is not the Cuban people who are in such straits. Sugar is not the sole industry in Cuba, although it may be the greatest; but it has been shown here on this floor during this debate that the sugar trust controls nine-tenths of the sugar production of Cuba. Now, should this bill pass, our revenues will be reduced about $8,000,000 annually, with no reciprocal benefit to the American people. The people of the United States consume each year about 2,400,000 tons of sugar, and the price is fixed by the sugar trust.

If this bill passes, will the price of sugar be reduced to the consumer? Most assuredly not. One of their claims even now is that Cuban sugar can not be produced at the present price and afford a profit. So the effect of this bill will be to put into the pocket of the sugar trust the lion's share of this $8,000,000 reduction and not a hundredth part of a cent's reduction in the price to the consumer.

Ought the United States Government to discriminate in this manner? Ought we to legislate to confer benefits upon one industry, no matter how great, at the expense of the rest of the business interests of the country?

I am for the people of my own country first, last, and all the time. Their interests are my interests and their good my good; and I want to say to the advocates of this bill that when you extend to every other industry the concessions you offer sugar I am with you.

If you give Cuba a reduction of 20 per cent on sugar, give the people of the United States a reduction of 20 per cent on wire fencing, on lumber, on steel, on hides, and wood pulp, and all the articles now controlled by trusts, and I will join you with my vote. When you propose to ease some burden from a foreign country or a favored trust in this, I challenge you to remove the burden of your iniquitous tariff from the people of this land, who are bowed down to the earth with burdens grievous to be borne.

The people will stand some kinds of injustice with only a little grumbling, but they will not consent to being robbed of the necessities of life by a trust that has no other purpose than to increase its profits to the full extent of its power.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, in this morning's issue of the Washington Post I found a column headed, "A Bomb in Caucus—Republican Proposition to Southern Democrats—United Front on Cuba," and so on. Later on I read, "From the very outset, the caucus was of an exciting character. Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, who got the floor immediately after the meeting was called to order, threw a bombshell into the caucus by announcing that overtures had come to him from the Republican side, by which it was to be agreed that the Republican leaders would abandon the Crumpacker resolution to investigate the Southern election laws if the delegations from the States concerned (North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Virginia) would aid the majority to close debate and would vote against the appeals which would be taken from the decision of the Chair when the motions to open up the bill to general amendment are offered."

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that that statement, if true, and that declaration, if made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], is of a very serious character. It charges certain members of this House with attempting to traffic in the legislation before this body, charges them with a willingness to sacrifice measures that by many are deemed to be of most important character in order to secure the ultimate triumph of the bill now pending. I believe that the gentleman from Alabama was mistaken. I think that he has been misinformed, but at the same time I believe that it is his duty to this House to be more explicit, and to locate this offense where it properly belongs. I believe he is mistaken, for many reasons. Among them is, in a certain sense, the insignificant character of the proposition now before the House. Further is the fact that, in my judgment, but few gentlemen in this House are solicitously anxious for the success of the pending measure. [Applause.]

There are two places in this body where votes are taken—one here under the publicity of a roll call and one in the cloakroom. I do not hesitate to say that from the cloakroom vote it is a safe statement that 90 per cent of all the Republicans upon this side are indifferent or are opposed to the present measure. [Applause.] You hear it upon all hands. In the retirement of the cloakroom there are no urgent advocates for the passage of this measure. I am further persuaded that I am correct by arguments that I have heard upon this floor. I listened with great attention, as I always do, to the utterances of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] on my right. I remember what he told us. He said that when this proposition came to him, coupled with a 50 per cent reduction, he indignantly spurned it. When the proposition came for a 40 per cent reduction, again he refused; and then at 30 or 33, again he refused. And finally, quoting his language, when the ultimatum of 25 per cent was proposed, again he said he would have nothing of it. But when they came at him with that other ultimatum—20 per cent, when that little nickel differential appeared—then it was that his virtue weakened. [Laughter.]

Think of it, Mr. Chairman, he depicted here the unfortunate position in which the "reconcentrados" were, in which the "insurgents" were, "those who were engaged in the division of the great Republican party," "who were destroying the integrity of its councils," and "who were in revolt against authority and the leaders of the party," as being of the most serious and pernicious character. Yet think how nearly he came to being in that most unfortunate plight. [Laughter.] If that nickel had never appeared above the horizon of his vision, he would have been a reconcentrado. [Laughter.] He would have been to-day an insurgent. He would have been a rebel against authority, and he would now be engaged, quoting his own language, in dividing the Republican party and imperiling the future of the Republic.

Great God! On what a slender thread
Hang everlasting things!

[Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great attention to this debate. I listened to the great speech of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LONG] the other day—a great speech in certain lines. I think he spoke for two hours and thirty-five minutes; to be minute and accurate, one hundred and fifty-five minutes. I thought it was, physically speaking, the greatest effort of human endurance that I had ever witnessed. [Laughter.] And I thought then that if the gentleman had begun in time and had had proper training, and had the moral qualities, there might be yet a great future before him in the prize ring under the Marquis of Queensbury rules. [Laughter.]

But I was sorry, Mr. Chairman, to see so much of physical endeavor devoted to the destruction of what I supposed to be the Republican idea of reciprocity—that policy of ours that was to aid protection, that policy of ours that was to enlarge the labor field, that policy that was to make more of days' works in this country, that was to augment the wage, that was to bring more of comfort into the homes, that was to give more of stability to the political power of this country through contentment, and that was to serve the purposes of the great Republican party in lifting up the labor of this country and giving it its proper status in this land. I did not know until I heard his speech that it was to be used as a convenient vehicle by which particular gain could be brought to particular men without regard to this vaster question of the benefit of labor of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment this question is not of the importance that it has been given by the proceedings of this House. There are certain propositions that we may consider as settled that are involved in it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has settled one. He has stated in most emphatic terms that we owe no debt, moral or pecuniary, to the people of Cuba. I take it that that is settled. It is settled, I think, from the admissions that have been made here and the testimony taken before the committee, that there is no suffering in Cuba—that Cuban labor is employed. Mark it. That is the language of four or five witnesses, emphatically saying that all are employed. Only one, I think, has differed from the positiveness of that statement, and he said all outside of Habana. It is all employed at wages far beyond those heretofore known to the Cuban laborer. So that there is no question of suffering there. Those propositions, I think, may be regarded as settled.

Who will be the beneficiary of the possible $10,000,000 or more that will be the result of this legislation? Gentlemen have read letters here from officials in Cuba, some of them dated many weeks ago, with relation to the present location and ownership of the sugar crop. But I take it that is not the question. The question is, Where will that location be when this legislation becomes effective? Mind you, it does not go into effect in its beneficial influences to Cuban people when it receives the signature of our Executive. It still depends upon action to be taken in another tribunal, a new tribunal in the way of legislation, whose first days and weeks and months perhaps will be devoted to the establishment of a government, with relation to governmental matters of primary importance with which they are entirely unfamiliar. It will be months before this act can be operative. Where will the sugar crop then be?

The important question for us to consider, I think, if we owe something to those people, and if we propose to relieve their necessities, is, Will this act carry out that charitable and kindly purpose? Gentlemen have told us that the price of sugar is always fixed in the Hamburg market. Possibly, as a rule, that may be true; but, gentlemen, are there not conditions here that disturb that rule? Here is a surplus of eight or nine hundred thousand tons of sugar more than the world's demand. That is upon the market. In this country practically there is but one buyer. With that great surplus seeking a market, with that one buyer undisturbed by competition, will he not fix the prices to suit himself, and in that way gather into his pocket this kindly aid that you are proposing for destitute Cubans? It so appears to me, and therefore that is a valid reason to my mind why I am willing to aid in preventing this legislation.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another phase of this question that, in my judgment, has not received sufficiently the attention of the thoughtful gentlemen of this House. I refer now to the conditions that we propose to impose upon the people of Cuba prior to their securing the aid that we are proffering them in the bill. I saw a letter from a distinguished citizen of my own State a few days ago, written after extensive journeyings throughout the island of Cuba. I know that he is a thoughtful, observing man, that he went into the island for the purpose of informing himself as to the actual conditions with reference, doubtless, to the future employment of large capital in the island. He writes, among other things——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa may be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not see how that can be done under the arrangements that have already been made. It is understood that the colleague of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] should have an hour and a half each to close the debate. That is the understanding up to this morning, and they will now have but one hour or a little more.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time for closing debate be fixed at 4 o'clock, or half-past 3 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The order having been made in the House, the Chair thinks the committee could not change it, and that it would be necessary to go into the House.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I give to the gentleman from Iowa five minutes of my time. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I am very grateful to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this gentleman having taken——

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman can not finish in the time allotted him, I yield five minutes to him of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. As the result of these observations, he tells us that less than one-tenth of all of the surface of Cuba is now under cultivation; that nine-tenths of it, incalculably rich, are now unproductive. Gentlemen have told us that have appeared as witnesses the reason why that is true; it is because the labor of that island is now all employed in the cultivation of one-tenth, and without we add nine-tenths in addition, with all the advantages that are conceivable in a fertile soil, with a climate such as that of Cuba, there is an inexorable limitation put on them. It is a want of labor. We experienced a difficulty of this kind, and while we had unoccupied land in the United States we invited immigration. There were no restrictions until the farms were occupied; until all our vast public domain susceptible of unaided cultivation was under the domain of the homesteader.

Now, what are we proposing to do to Cuba? Their great want just now is labor—population. We say to them, we will give you this pittance of $10,000,000 provided you will adopt our exclusion laws, our contract-labor laws, our immigration laws that we would not tolerate, that the people of the United States gave no indorsement to until the ten-tenths of our lands had been brought under the plow. We propose to be a great sugar-producing State; but we say to Cuba that by this legislation you must limit your output to 850,000 tons, although her soil is capable, if these restrictions are not put upon her, of producing 5,000,000 tons. And we do that in the name of charity and kindliness! What will the critic of the future, the man who writes the history of this epoch—what will he say of the generosity of the United States?

I do not know who is the author of this bill. I know if everything that has been said to the disadvantage of the Yankee; if he was, as he is not, all that has been said—grasping, avaricious, cunning, adroit, always looking out for his own interest, careless of the interests of other people or the rights of other people—then I say that this bill was written by some Yankee. [Laughter.] I believe that we can not afford to pass this bill with these conditions in it. Gentlemen have said that there is going to be no harm resulting from this; that 20 per cent is a very little matter; it does not amount to anything. It does not in a sense. It may be the beet-sugar producer will go on producing beets, but no other man will put his large capital—$600,000—into a plant to further foster the industry.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] what he would have said if in 1892, early in the year, when a few tin plate manufacturing plants had been established under the McKinley tariff bill, if at that time that industry had been assailed in the house of its friends by a 20 per cent reduction of the duties upon tin plate? What would he have said? Possibly that even under these rates those in the business might still endure; they might go on; but would other capital have been invested in other plants, and would we be in a condition that we now are, producing all, or substantially all, of the tin plate we need, giving employment to a quarter of million of people, and bringing comfort into the homes of hundreds of thousands? He would have regarded such a procedure as an assault upon the future development of the industry. That is what we fear in the case of the beet-sugar industry.

I look forward to the time when we will produce within the limits of the United States—and I believe it will come within the next ten years if no hurt is done to the encouragement of the industry—when all of the sugar that we consume, probably then 3,000,000 tons, will be produced within the limits of the United States; that we will save at home more than $125,000,000; that we will diversify our agricultural industry; that we will have the benefit to come from that diversification; that we will have the benefit of the restoration of the land through the use of the by-products; that incalculable advantages are to come to us if we will simply let alone the conditions that now exist.

That is all that we ask; we are asking for no additional rates, but simply ask to maintain in good faith what has been promised, having some regard for the language of the gentleman from New York when in his memorable speech he told us that the tariff then enacted was to stand for twenty-five years. [Applause.] But now, the gentleman has discovered that "that was before the wah" [laughter]; the Spanish war, I mean. He is somewhat like that lady down in southern Virginia, who, out with her lover on a stroll, a Northern chap, admiring the moon, suggested that he ought to have seen that moon before the war. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LACEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3896. An act to amend section 3362 of the Revised Statutes, relating to tobacco;

S. 4868. An act granting an increase of pension to James H. Walker;

S. 5062. An act to authorize the county commissioners of Crow Wing County, in the State of Minnesota, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at a point between Pine River and Dean Brook, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War; and

S. R. 82. Joint resolution providing for the printing annually of franks required for sending out seed.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 13031. An act to prohibit the coming into and to regulate the residence within the United States, its Territories, and all territory under its jurisdiction, and the District of Columbia, of Chinese and persons of Chinese descent.

RECIPROCITY WITH CUBA.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The time remaining, two hours and twenty minutes, will be equally divided between the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if there is no objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for one hour and ten minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of regret that any of my party associates should differ with me on a question involving party policy, party pledges, and party honor. Yet there is some satisfaction in knowing that to defend our respective positions they, and not I, must depart from one of the cardinal principles of the Republican party—the principle of protection where that principle is necessary to the development of any American industry. [Applause.]

From some things that have been said in this debate concerning Republican differences upon the pending bill, it might be inferred that this is the first time that party division has ever occurred in this House; the first time that individual members have declined the personal "thrift that follows fawning," and dared stand by and defend their convictions of right and duty to their constituents, their party, and their country.

Those of us who have served on this floor for ten years or more are well aware of the fact that party division on questions pertaining to the carrying out of Executive recommendations is not an unusual but a common occurrence. We remember that in the Fifty-third Congress the distinguished leader upon this side of the House, Hon. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, voted in committee and on this floor with some of his most distinguished party associates and against the majority of their party in favor of issuing gold interest-bearing bonds. We also remember that in the next succeeding Congress Mr. Reed was elected Speaker of this House by the unanimous vote of his party.

Many other notable instances of this kind might be cited, especially when questions involving the tariff were pending. The RECORD of the Fifty-first Congress contains a very vigorous, emphatic, and eloquent speech, delivered by the distinguished gentleman who now presides over this House, criticising severely certain provisions of the McKinley bill, because, in his judgment, that bill discriminated against the farmers of the West and in favor of the manufacturers of the East.

These instances of party division and of individual independence are cited only to show that not until recently has it been considered an act of party disloyalty or treason to party to oppose that which a minority of your party in this House proposes.

In this case anger and wrath have been poured upon the heads of party associates because, unlike some of their colleagues, they have not deemed it either politically wise or for the best interest of their country to surrender their convictions on this question and perform the acrobatic feat so successfully performed by others. Our motives have been impugned, and we have been subjected to insults upon this floor because we oppose the plan by which the leaders on both sides of the House propose to carry out the recommendation of the President respecting Cuba, and also because we propose a plan different from theirs. We are told that in doing so we are endangering the future success of our party and our future control of this House. Passing the assumption of superior political wisdom implied in this accusation, how, I ask, can the success of the Republican party be put in jeopardy by opposing a measure that three-fourths of the Democrats on this floor will vote for? When did the Republican party become so weak and impotent that to insure its future success we must favor such propositions affecting protection and reciprocity only as are approved by the Democrats on this floor.

WE WOULD PROMOTE CUBA'S WELFARE.

It can not be claimed that because we oppose this bill for the alleged relief of Cuba we are opposed to that which will promote the welfare of her people and government, a government soon to be launched upon the sea of national independence. On the contrary, throughout this controversy we have urged the adoption of a policy intended to give to the empty treasury of Cuba the money needed to enable the government to meet promptly every just obligation and continue that splendid system of sanitation inaugurated and successfully carried out under American rule, and to enable that new government to make such internal improvements as are necessary and which will afford employment to her people and inspire hope and confidence in the future success of their little republic.

STATEMENT OF REASONS FOR OPPOSING BILL.

In order that the disinterested millions of our countrymen may know the exact truth in regard to our position and the grounds upon which we have from the beginning opposed this proposed reduction of the duty upon the products of the American farm for the benefit of Americans and foreigners in a foreign country, I will here present the statement of our reasons, so ably and tersely set forth in the paper prepared and recently presented to the Republican conference on the pending proposition by Hon. ROBERT W. TAYLER of Ohio, who so worthily represents that district so long and ably represented by the man whose life was devoted to his country and to the principle for which we who oppose the passage of this bill are now contending—the late Hon. William McKinley. [Applause.]

We oppose the proposition to reduce the tariff on Cuban products coming into this country, because it involves a relaxation of the protective principle.

The Republican platform of 1896 condemned the Democratic party for not keeping faith with the American sugar growers. We seek not to merit for ourselves the same condemnation.

The proposition to reduce the sugar tariff is unwise and unjust because—

1. It constitutes, in essence, an abandonment of the protective principle, even though it removes only one-fifth of the duty imposed by the Dingley law. And this abandonment is most unhappy, because applied to the pursuit of agriculture in the most conspicuous instance in which specific and manifest protection is given to the farmer, and at the moment when the sugar-beet industry is not only in its infancy, but in an infancy so lusty and promising as to demonstrate the certainty of a rapid and prodigious growth. The beet-sugar industry exhibits in the most perfect form we have yet known the most approved principles of protection.

Heretofore the farmer has been compelled to find his justification of protection, from the standpoint of personal interest, in the prosperity reflected from the industrial artisan, and in the main he has, through good report and evil, been bravely loyal.

Since our platform of 1896 gave a party's guaranty of permanence the people took us at our word, and we have demonstrated that in the beet-sugar industry we could, more vividly than in any other enterprise, illustrate to the American farmer on his own broad acres the beneficence of the American system of protection.

The American market for over $100,000,000 worth of sugar annually is rightfully his. We shall encourage no policy which delays the time when he shall come into his own.

2. As to the fancied duty to Cuba because of a distress which is only apparent in the admitted fact that every man on the island has all the work he can do at higher wages than he ever before received, we have only to say that the low price of sugar is a mere business condition of temporary character (the cause of which has probably been removed within the past few days by the Brussels conference), and that to compromise with it on the terms proposed is, in its interference with the policy of protection, to pay too high a price for all the good that can possibly come to those whom it is intended to benefit.

The proposition is to undertake to insure commercial and industrial prosperity in Cuba, a foreign country and a foreign government. If we undertake it, when and where are we to stop?

It is a startling proposition, entirely outside of our governmental functions and our constitutional power.

Whenever we have undertaken to insure commercial and industrial prosperity in the United States, our own country, by means of a protective tariff, we have been bitterly assailed on the ground of paternalism.

Now, at the expense of our own labor, our own capital, and our own industry, and largely at the expense of a single industry, without reducing the cost of sugar to the American consumer, we are asked to extend the paternal hand to a foreign people on the ground that, having given them liberty, we are morally obligated to secure them commercial and industrial prosperity, even at the sacrifice of our own interests.

We emphatically deny that we are under any such obligation, morally or otherwise.

We insist that such an undertaking subjects the Congress of the United States to the charge of being false to its constitutional obligations, untrue to the people it represents, and, from a political standpoint, false to the pledges made by the party to the people when it asked and received their support.

3. Entirely independent of its effect on the beet-sugar industry as a present fact in established concerns, it would smother the further development of the industry through the scores of plants now in various stages of active advancement.

An industry which has grown fivefold in the last four years, and doubled since 1900, has in it the certainty of a future development so stupendous as to beggar prophecy, and appeals with cogent force to our national pride.

4. In so far as the proposition professes to be in the line of Republican reciprocity, we assert that it is essentially a denial of that great policy. We deny that reciprocity is desirable except as a corollary to the greater policy of protection. Republican reciprocity, wise reciprocity, does not seek an exchange of products at the expense of any American industry; it does not seek to give; it does not give commercial advantage to any foreign product which comes into competition with our own products; it does not seek an exchange of products which deprives any American artisan of his work or any American farmer of an opportunity to profitably till his soil.

This was explicitly declared by McKinley in his Buffalo speech in the following words:

By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus.

And by President Roosevelt in his annual message in these words:

And that reciprocity be sought for so far as it can safely be done without injury to our home industries.

5. To say that the duty on sugar is to be lowered on the plea that it helps Cuba is to say that it must always be lowered when Cuba needs help, and a reduction of one-fifth by the House of Representatives means that elsewhere, both in and out of Congress, the extent of that reduction shall be measured by the varying views of those who consider it.

It must therefore follow that the protective principle is to be subordinated to the question as to what amount of help Cuba may need.

With such a policy declared by a Republican majority, what wise business man can be induced to invest his money in the beet-sugar industry? What promise will there be of its future development?

And if that Republican majority is once constrained to such a policy, what license have we to believe that the citadel of protection will not be further assaulted in the house of its friends. When that time comes the days of Republican supremacy will be numbered.

We pledged our faith in 1896 to the sugar growers of the country, and they took us at our word; in 1897 we kept the faith and passed the Dingley law; and the people, relying on that law and our party pride and traditions, proceeded to develop, in amazing proportions, the industry which we specifically encouraged them to enter.

We are told that the pending proposition will not hurt the beet-sugar producers, but surely no one anywhere has asserted that it would help them.

A tariff measure which has the unanimous indorsement of free traders is not above suspicion, and a search warrant will not be needed to find all the protection that is hidden away in it.

Never more earnestly than at this hour have we been summoned to our duty; never has the cause of protection—to which we owe our party success and our national prosperity—more needed our undivided and unflinching support.

RELIEF AND RECIPROCITY WITHOUT INJURY TO ANY AMERICAN INDUSTRY.

Mr. Chairman, that the country may also know how we have proposed to carry out the recommendations of the President, aid Cuba, and secure reciprocity with that island, I will submit as part of my remarks the proposition presented to the Republican conference by that stalwart Republican from Ohio, Hon. CHARLES DICK, on behalf of the Republicans who oppose the pending bill, together with the statement which Mr. DICK at the same time presented, setting forth the advantages of our plan for the relief of Cuba over the one now before us.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this conference that the Committee on Ways and Means be directed to report to the House a bill for the relief of Cuba substantially embodying the following: That the President be authorized to enter into a commercial agreement with the government of Cuba, when the same shall have been organized and established, whereby on account of the relations which have existed between the United States and Cuba since 1898, and in consideration of such reduction of duties as shall be satisfactory to the President on goods, wares, and merchandise the growth or product of the United States imported into Cuba, he shall agree to pay each year, for three years, to the government of Cuba a sum of money equivalent to 20 per cent of the duties collected and paid into the Treasury of the United States on goods, wares, and merchandise the growth or product of the island of Cuba imported into this country.

Adhering to the statement we have hertofore made to this conference expressing our reasons for opposing a reduction of the duties on the products of Cuba and in the interest of harmony, and for the purpose of affording relief to Cuba, if such relief is needed, and mindful of the fact recently developed that during the last fiscal year there was a deficit in the public treasury of the island of Cuba of nearly $500,000, we submit the following additional statement of our reasons therefor:

1. It will afford relief both to the government and the people of Cuba.
2. It makes certain that Cuba and her people and no one else will be the beneficiaries of our action.
3. By its adoption we keep faith with the people of this country and the people of Cuba.
4. It does not violate our national party platforms of 1896 and 1900.
5. It does not disturb existing conditions in this country.
6. It does not alter or modify any schedule of the present tariff law.
7. It does not injure or discourage any domestic industry or prevent its further development.
8. It avoids an inopportune agitation of questions affecting industrial conditions of unparalleled prosperity.
9. It would secure reciprocal trade concessions from Cuba and give time to ascertain the value of such trade relations between the two Republics under existing conditions.
10. Its reciprocal feature furnishes a consideration which makes the proposed measure of undoubted constitutionality. It is as competent for Congress to purchase trade concessions from foreign countries as to purchase naval or coaling stations.
11. It is sustained by precedent since the establishment of our Government, and particularly by the legislation refunding duties collected on the products of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands.
12. It affords the means and opportunity for successfully inaugurating and permanently establishing the new government of Cuba during a time which the experience of all nations has shown will be its most critical period.
13. It affords relief until the present adverse trade conditions affecting the price of sugar shall have been improved by the abolishment of European sugar bounties.
14. It discharges every obligation assumed by us under the provisions of the treaty of Paris, the Platt amendment, and by our intervention to secure the independence of Cuba.

This proposition, sir, was not made because of any distress, either present or prospective, in Cuba or because of any recognized obligation, resting either upon honor or otherwise, to insure the industrial prosperity of a foreign country. On the contrary, it has been admitted from the beginning by many who are urging the pending proposition that there is no distress in Cuba, and the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who will follow me, together with many others upon this floor, has publicly declared that, as a nation, we "are under no obligation to Cuba, either legal, equitable, or moral."

The proposition, therefore, to refund to the government of Cuba 20 per cent of the duties collected at our ports on her products was offered as a compromise of our difference as to the necessity or the expediency of our doing anything in the premises. This proposition is in line, too, with our policy in respect to aiding Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, adopted for the very reason that we insist upon its application in respect to Cuba. Is it inapplicable as to Cuba because the powerful interest behind this agitation will not reap the benefit of duties it is certain to gain from a reduction of duties?

AMERICAN PEOPLE DECEIVED AS TO CONDITIONS IN CUBA.

At the beginning of this session of Congress there was a public sentiment in favor of "doing something for Cuba." But the evidence since taken before the Ways and Means Committee, commencing on January 15, 1902, proves conclusively that this sentiment was based upon erroneous information in some cases and in others upon absolutely false statements concerning conditions in that island. It is a notable fact, too, that since the taking of this testimony and its dissemination among the people there has been a radical change in public sentiment upon this question. I might cite numerous instances of this, but I will not stop to do so.

Mr. Chairman, it would require the use of a kaleidoscope to correctly represent the shifting ground upon which this legislation has been asked. First it was based upon the sympathy of the American people for the people of Cuba, who were represented to be in great distress, and also upon the ground that it would reduce the price of sugar to the American consumer. This last representation was made to the people through the press upon information furnished by Willett & Gray, agents of the sugar trust. Six months ago we were told that hunger and starvation prevailed in Cuba; that business men were being forced into bankruptcy, and that a deplorable condition of affairs, financial and industrial, existed generally. It was upon this ground that the Congress was first urged to do something immediately for Cuba. These representations were continued even up to the time the Committee on Ways and Means commenced the investigation of this question. On January 15, page 66 of the testimony, Mr. Mendoza, a sugar planter in Cuba, said:

Of course, we do not know what is going to happen, and that is why we have come to the United States to beg that something shall be done in our favor instead of coming later and begging for charity. I think it would cost you more to feed us and put things in order in Cuba than to afford us this relief at this time. Not because we are going to fight, but because the people are going to starve. They are not going to perish with yellow fever or typhoid fever; that is all past. * * * But the stomachs of the inhabitants are empty, and I fear that the consequences of the reconcentration policy of General Weyler are going to come up again in a different way.

Mr. Placé also said:

Mr. TAWNEY. That does not answer my question. Do you propose to maintain internal taxes?

Mr. PLACÉ. Yes, sir. We have to come to some conclusion; I do not see any other way. Our custom-house pays from $15,000,000 to $16,000,000, or rather has until to-day. As things are now we have only six weeks to live, and inside of six weeks we are busted. As soon as we have to face the payments at the end of this month I would like to know how we are going to do it, and we have to declare ourselves out.

It is evident from this testimony that these two Cuban witnesses intended to convey to the committee and to the country the impression that a most horrible condition of affairs existed at that time upon the island, for Mr. Mendoza said, "But the stomachs of the inhabitants are empty," and then, to impress more deeply upon the committee the then present conditions of the people, he falsely likened that condition to the consequences of the reconcentration policy of General Weyler. If these statements had been true they would have appealed to us as strongly as they did to our constituents three months ago, when they were made to them through the press. But they were false, as Mr. Mendoza and Mr. Placé were obliged to admit. The answers to the following questions only go to show to what extent these and other witnesses and that powerful interest behind this agitation has gone to deceive Congress and the country for the purpose of securing a reduction of duty that will make the production of sugar in Cuba more profitable than it is to-day, and at the same time increase the profits of the sugar trust and its power to crush our domestic beet-sugar industry, its only rival:

LABOR IS FULLY EMPLOYED.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is labor generally employed on the island outside of Habana?
Mr. MENDOZA. Sir?
Mr. TAWNEY. Is the laboring class now generally employed on the island outside of Habana?
Mr. MENDOZA. It is. All the sugar plantations are working by this time. They are all employed. There is plenty of work for the workmen in Cuba to-day.
Mr. TAWNEY. And at good wages?
Mr. MENDOZA. Well, not very good, because the wages in Cuba increase according to the price of sugar. When sugar is low we can not afford to pay high wages.
Mr. TAWNEY. They are paying now for common laborers as high as $30 a month, are they not?
Mr. MENDOZA. In some places in the island, but not in all. In the eastern part of the island, which is less populated, the wages of labor are higher.
Mr. TAWNEY. Then this condition of hunger or starvation which you have just outlined or detailed here does not exist to-day, does it?
Mr. MENDOZA. Not yet; it will exist.
Mr. TAWNEY. This request, then, for the admission of sugar free is in anticipation of distress?
Mr. MENDOZA. Yes, sir. It will exist, and it will exist not after the island has been left to the Cubans (as they say they are going to do; I do not believe it myself).

But let me give you other illustrations from the testimony showing how damnably false is the claim of Cuban distress and upon which false representations the sympathy of the American people was aroused and their demand for relief was based.

HUNGER AND DISTRESS DO NOT EXIST.

BLISS. I have not spoken of distress except to deny that any existed so far as I knew. It is a long time since I have seen any one begging on the streets, or any one who wanted work who was not at work at good wages (p. 399).
BLISS. I should say there was no distress whatever from all I have seen (p. 389).
HAWLEY. Q. And anybody who comes there will be a competitor in the field of labor, and as all these people are now employed, how can they be distressed and starved?
A. Who has said they are (p. 372)?
MENDOZA. Q. Then this condition of hunger or starvation which you have just outlined or detailed here does not exist to-day, does it?
A. Not yet; it will exist (p. 67).
ABAD. Q. Then there is no suffering among the laboring classes, is there?
A. No, that is not the case, because living in Cuba is very high; it is very expensive (p. 144). The situation in Cuba to-day is that they have not enough laborers to do the work.

LABORERS' WAGES $23 TO $30 PER MONTH.

ATKINS. The wages are high. Wages there run quite as high as the average agricultural labor in the United States (p. 15).
ATKINS. The price of labor in Cuba is in excess of the price of labor in the Southern States (p. 29).
BLISS. The men themselves get varying wages, but many of them, in many portions of the island, get as much as $30 a month American gold; others much less than that. When I say much less I mean $4, $5, or $5 less (p. 398).
ATKINS. In my section I pay about $23 for a month of twenty-six working days. Mr. Kelly has to pay $1 a day (p. 18).
HAWLEY. Q. Is labor employed there?
A. It is.
Q. Can labor find full employment?
A. It has employment at the present time.
Q. At good wages?
A. At good wages; yes (p. 368).
KELLY. Roustabout or unskilled labor in Cuba is 90 cents to $1.10 per day United States gold (p. 51).
KELLY. In our end of the island we are paying an average of $30 a month (p. 57).
MENDOZA. There is plenty of work for the workmen in Cuba to-day (p. 66).
PLACÉ. We are paying $22 to $24 a month (p. 76).

IMPORTING LABOR.

RABADAN. Since the American occupation there has been a Spanish immigration of 60,000 laborers. (Charles Rabadan, export merchant, p. 75).
MACHADO. To double our crop we must have 300,000 laborers in the fields, working only in cane (p. 445).
PLACÉ. We would like to get the laborers from Spain or the Canaries (p. 97).
PLACÉ. Q. If you undertook, or the conditions were such as would encourage the further development of sugar, you would have to import labor?
A. Yes, sir (p. 97).
PLACÉ. Q. At the present time outside of Habana there is no labor that is idle or unemployed
A. No, sir (p. 97).
ATKINS. The men are not to be had, and in order to increase the cane crop of Cuba I think you would have to import the labor to make it (p. 15).
ATKINS. Under normal conditions, sir, the labor in Cuba is not sufficient to go around (p. 36).
HAWLEY. All that seek employment are employed (p. 372).
ABAD. The situation in Cuba to-day is that they have not enough laborers to do the work (p. 144).

PROPERTY AND BUSINESS OF THE ISLAND IN THE HANDS OF SPANIARDS.

ATKINS. A large proportion of the property of the island is owned by Spaniards (p. 11).
PLACÉ. The business of the island is in the hands of the Spaniards. All business is in their hands. The majority of the Spaniards have not renounced their allegiance [to Spain]; they remain Spanish (p. 95).
Mr. RUSSELL. Is there distress in the island of Cuba?
Mr. HAWLEY. There is very serious distress.
Mr. RUSSELL. Among whom?
Mr. HAWLEY. You are speaking as to the sugar condition?
Mr. RUSSELL. I am speaking of distress in the island of Cuba.
Mr. HAWLEY. I think the distress is largely among the people who, possessed of enterprise, have resumed their business there since the war, who are undertaking to develop the conditions that existed before that time.
Mr. RUSSELL. Is labor employed there?
Mr. HAWLEY. It is.
Mr. RUSSELL. Can labor find full employment?
Mr. HAWLEY. It has employment at present.
Mr. RUSSELL. At good wages?
Mr. HAWLEY. At good wages; yes.
Mr. RUSSELL. And the distress is the apprehension that capital will not get its due reward for the enterprise it is undertaking?
Mr. HAWLEY. The distress is capital is not getting any reward on the enterprise it is undertaking. On the other hand, it is to-day losing money.
Mr. DALZELL. Has the interest you have there been recently acquired?
Mr. HAWLEY. It has been recently acquired; yes.
The CHAIRMAN. Would a rise of half a cent a pound in the market price of sugar in the world remove all this distress?
Mr. HAWLEY. An advance of half a cent a pound above present prices would cause, naturally, a great difference in the present situation. It would not, however, if the price should increase over the present value of sugar to that extent, make the business especially inviting as a new investment.

By these admissions of the Cubans themselves this plea of starving Cuba, bankruptcy, financial ruin, distress, and the ragged edge of collapse is completely exploded; for they tell us themselves that every man upon the island who wants work is employed; that the sugar industry, until the hearings commenced on January 15, 1902, and all other industries on the island were prosperous and had been profitable to those engaged in them. It is obvious, therefore, that all this uproar about Cuban distress and starvation comes from purely mercenary motives, and that the plea was made for the deliberate purpose of deceiving the American people and the American Congress.

There can be no more infallible indication of the prosperous condition of a people at any given time than the abundance of employment to labor. No matter what the state of civilization, no matter what may be the character of their industry or the grade of their social life, however high the civilization, there is always hardship among all classes when there is any considerable amount of enforced idleness among the laboring class. On the other hand, however low the civilization, you will never find hardship, distress, or starvation in any country where labor is employed to the full limit, as it is in Cuba; and when a people are fully employed they are not starving, their "stomachs are not empty," and they are in no danger of distress or in danger of enduring exceptional industrial or social hardships.

Upon the facts, then, there is absolutely no ground upon which to base this proposed legislation—no ground even to propose a sham reciprocity, which is all that this bill provides for.

Notwithstanding the fact that no distress exists or has existed for several years, yet it was the plea of starvation and our moral obligation to Cuba upon which this agitation was originally based. No more complete answer to both claims has appeared anywhere than in an editorial in the Washington Post of September 25, 1901, as follows:

To the argument that Cuba will starve unless we coddle her industries at the expense of our own, the obvious reply is that Cuba is already overwhelmingly in our debt. When, in April, 1898, the United States assumed the task of destroying the power of Spain in the West Indies, it was clamorously declared by the insurgents that they asked only for emancipation. Their country, so they explained, was fertile beyond words; they needed only the opportunity to labor for themselves, free from exacting and rapacious taskmasters. "Break our manacles," they cried, "and we will soon show you a paradise upon earth, a land flowing with milk and honey, an abode of happiness and peace beyond description." We broke the manacles, such as they were, spending millions of money and squandering hundreds of precious lives in the transaction, and now—more than three years afterwards—these same gentlemen tell us that unless we grant them further favors and again sacrifice our own domestic interests to theirs they will be bankrupt. It is not enough that we have driven out the Spaniards—we are to go on until the end of time with our policy of coddling and self-immolation.

We undertook to free Cuba in a political sense, and if the former insurgents represent the welfare and the aspirations of the Cuban people we have abundantly redeemed our pledges. We did not undertake, however, to feed, clothe, and house the insurgent leaders forever, to provide them with salaries and official positions, and finally, after withdrawing from the island, to inaugurate and maintain an economic status under which their power and emoluments would be secured to them in perpetuity.

FACTS AND FICTION CONTRASTED.

Mr. Chairman, as a further illustration of how the American people have been deceived as to the real conditions in Cuba, how their sympathy has been aroused by misrepresentations, and how it was attempted to deceive the American Congress as to the facts concerning the industrial and financial condition of her people, I will present to the House, in parallel columns, some of the testimony I have just quoted as to the actual condition of the people, and newspaper dispatches as to their alleged condition, the testimony being given on practically the same day these dispatches were published. I do this in order that we may contrast the actual condition as shown by the personal knowledge of the Cubans themselves and the alleged condition as represented by leading newspapers throughout the country.

JANUARY 25, 1902.

I should say there was no distress whatever from all I have seen (p. 389).

I have not spoken of distress, except to deny that any existed, so far as I knew. It is a long time since I have seen anyone begging on the streets or anyone who wanted work who was not at work at good wages (p. 399).

JANUARY 27, 1902.

The public misery is terrible. Municipal council requests your support for speedy solution of economic problem, to avoid awful condition of hunger and calamities which will occur if efficient remedy is not furnished. Laborers without work; there are no industries; commerce is ruined. Cuban people expect that the United States, the arbiter of this situation, will make of Cuba a happy country, and not a land of mendicants.

Q. And anybody who comes there will be a competitor in the field of labor, and as all these people are now employed, how can they be distressed and starved?

A. Who has said they are (p. 372)?

[Extract from testimony of ex-Congressman R. A. Hawley, interested with Howells and Post of sugar trust, in 75,000 acre Cuban sugar plantation, who appeared before Committee on Ways and Means on January 24, 1902, to ask for Cuban tariff reduction on sugar.]

JANUARY 21, 1902.

Q. Then there is no suffering among the laboring classes, is there?

A. No, that is not the case, because living in Cuba is very high. It is very expensive.

The situation in Cuba to-day is that they have not enough laborers to do the work (p. 144).

[Extract from testimony of L. U. de Abad, secretary of the Cuban delegation in Washington, who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means January 21, favoring tariff concessions to Cuba.]

Q. Then, this condition of hunger or starvation which you have just outlined or detailed here does not exist to-day, does it?

A. Not yet; it will exist (p. 67).

There is plenty of work for the workmen in Cuba to-day (p. 66).

Roustabout or unskilled labor in Cuba is 90 cents to $1.10 per day, United States gold.

In our end of the island we are paying an average of $30 a month. (Kelly, owner 9,000-acre plantation, in testimony before Committee on Ways and Means, January 15, pp. 51 and 57.)

We are paying $22 to $24 a month. [Louis V. Place, p. 76.]

BEA, President Matanzas Board of Merchants.

[Testimony, p. 63, January 15.]

I might extend indefinitely this contrast between the testimony as to the actual conditions in Cuba and newspaper representations concerning the same subject. I could show from the testimony of Col. James D. Hill, of New Orleans, page 279 of the record who presented to the Committee on Ways and Means numerous newspaper clippings, being the articles of a resident Habana correspondent of a leading industrial paper in the United States, showing the extent to which all industries on the island of Cuba have been prospering since the close of the Spanish-American war, and dispatches from Cuba since the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means commenced on January 15 alleging hunger and starvation to exist among the people—ruin, distress, and general collapse in all industries. But it is not necessary. The proof already submitted is overwhelming in favor of the conclusion that the representations made through the public press of this country as to the conditions in Cuba are absolutely false and unfounded in fact. What I have already submitted is sufficient to convince anyone not financially interested in Cuba that never before has there been such an outrageous attempt to bunco the American people for the purpose of securing national legislation favorable to American capital invested in a foreign country. [Applause.]

I have called attention to this, not to reflect on anyone, but because I feel it is the duty of everyone in possession of the facts to present them to the people, that they may know the truth and aid in preventing the consummation of the selfish designs of unscrupulous speculators, who would ruin a domestic industry that their investments in a foreign country might be more profitable. [Applause.]

CLAIM THAT AMERICAN CONSUMER WOULD DERIVE ANY BENEFIT DISPROVEN.

But it was also said, during the summer and fall of 1901 that a reduction of the duty on sugar coming from Cuba would reduce the price to the consumer and save to the people of the United States in round numbers $89,000,000. Circular letters to that effect were sent broadcast to the press throughout this country by Willett & Gray, sugar brokers of New York City, and publishers of a weekly statistical sugar trade journal in the interest of the sugar trust.

This promised benefit has likewise disappeared in the light of the testimony of the Cubans and American sugar brokers, practically all of whom testified that the reduction of duty on raw sugar coming from Cuba would not reduce the price of refined sugar to the American consumer, because that price is determined by the world's price, which is fixed daily at London, f. o. b. Hamburg, on the basis of Europe's surplus of raw sugar. In support of this statement I need only refer to the testimony of Mr. Armstrong, of New York, Mr. Atkins, Mr. Mendoza, and almost all of the other witnesses who testified in favor of this proposition. The large quantity of sugar now held in Cuba awaiting this proposed reduction, 800,000 tons, may and no doubt will, when it comes into our market, depress the price of raw sugar somewhat, but as Mr. Armstrong, a sugar broker in New York, told us this would be only temporary, while the trust would undoubtedly maintain the price of refined sugar.

THE PLEA OF ANTICIPATED DISTRESS NOT SUSTAINED BY THE FACTS.

When the present starvation plea was exploded, when it was shown by their own admissions that labor was fully employed and at good wages, that a reduction of the duty on raw sugar would not reduce the price of refined to the consumer, it then became necessary for that powerful interest that from the beginning has been behind this agitation to again shift its position to some other ground upon which to ask Congress to grant these tariff concessions (for the benefit of the sugar trust). The attempt to deceive the American people and the American Congress by false representations as to present conditions in the island and as to the alleged benefit to the American consumer having been exposed by their own admissions, they then said that while the distress did not now exist it was imminent and relief should be granted immediately. They then told us that the present sugar crop would not be ground at the present price of sugar, that this would necessarily throw labor out of employment and in consequence of this enforced idleness disorder, riots, and political disturbances would necessarily ensue, again necessitating our intervention upon the island for the purpose of establishing peace and order.

Although this is a purely speculative claim, and can neither be proven nor disproven with absolute certainty any more than any other anticipated result could be, yet it is the principal ground upon which the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee based his argument in support of the pending bill a few days ago.

The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] anticipates distress for the same reason that the Cuban planters, when they were forced to admit that no distress existed now, said they anticipated that result—that is, that because of the low price of sugar the Cuban planter will not be able to sell this year's crop and next year's crop at a price sufficient to compensate him for the cost of production.

Accepting the statements of these witnesses, who deliberately misrepresented the facts concerning the condition of the people in Cuba, who likewise evaded questions in regard to the cost of production, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means says to this House that the cost of producing sugar is 2 cents per pound. He was obliged to admit that there were other witnesses who placed the cost at from 1½ to 1¾ cents per pound, but these witnesses were disinterested American citizens. One of them, Mr. Saylor, who personally investigated this question in Cuba, is an officer of the Government, employed in the Department of Agriculture as an expert on this question. The testimony of these witnesses is not regarded by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] as of any value, but the testimony of the interested Cuban planter, although evasive, some of them refusing to answer direct questions as to the cost of production in their own factories, is accepted by him as conclusive.

The entire claim, however, of anticipated distress is founded upon these statements that the cost of production is at least 2 cents per pound.

COST OF SUGAR PRODUCTION IN CUBA LESS THAN 2 CENTS PER POUND.

I have here several statements, verified, too, by the oath of some of the men who appeared before our committee, which disproves the claim that it costs 2 cents per pound to produce sugar in Cuba. These are the verified petitions of American citizens and American corporations filed with the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission in this city, in which petitions claims are made not only for the destruction of property by the Spanish and insurgent troops, but also for the loss of profits for several years. In ascertaining their profit on the production of sugar it was necessary for them to state what it would have cost them to have produced the sugar on which they claimed the loss of profit. I will read one or two of them:

First, take claim No. 196 of the Constancia Sugar Company. The total amount of the claim is $4,177,698.85. Under the head of "loss of cane" the verified statement of the company as to the cost of production is as follows:

5. Loss of cane.—Constancia's production of cane in 1894 amounted to 17,253,703 arrobas. The cane was in a perfect state of cultivation and promised for the future an increased yield. In the years 1895, 1896, 1897, and 1898, however, the cane was absolutely destroyed and the ground materially injured, so that the cane was totally lost.

The loss in this regard may be readily estimated. Taking the cane product of the estate at 17,253,703 arrobas, the production of sugar, at the low estimate of 1 arroba of sugar to 10 arrobas of cane, would amount to 1,725,370 arrobas, which, at the lowest price reached during the period in question, would yield $1,077,355. Out of this sum, after making the liberal allowance of 75 per cent for expenses, such as planting, replanting, weeding, cutting, hauling, manufacture, and delivery at the place of shipment, there would remain, say, $359,118 clear profit.

Analyzed, this statement is as follows, and shows that instead of it costing 2 cents per pound or more to produce sugar in Cuba the actual cost is only $1.66 per hundred pounds, and that, too, in times of war, when the expense was necessarily greater than it would be in times of peace.

Cane ground per season, 17,253,703 arrobas (25 pounds each). Sugar produced on "the low estimate of 1 arroba of sugar to 10 arrobas of cane," 1,725,370 arrobas, or 43,134,250 pounds.

Swears production was worth	$1,077,355
Swears that after making the liberal allowance of 75 per cent for expenses, such as planting, replanting, weeding, cutting, hauling, manufacture, and delivery at the place of shipment, there would remain "as clear profit"	359,118
Hence the total cost of 43,134,250 pounds of sugar is	718,237

Which is $1.66 per 100 pounds, laid down at place of shipment.

From the following testimony of disinterested witnesses the claim that it costs 2 cents per pound to produce sugar in Cuba is conclusively disproven.

In the testimony before that committee, page 521, Mr. Saylor, special agent of the Department of Agriculture, in charge of the beet-sugar industry of the United States, and who investigated the sugar industry of Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Cuba for this Government, states that—

I felt that there were factories there which were producing sugar for $1.25 and factories that were producing it at $1.75. The difference would grow out of the fact that some factories were back in the island and the cost of getting the sugar to their own ports was considerably more than with others.

On page 533 Mr. Saylor, in reply to a question by Mr. HOPKINS, stated:

I said they were producing sugar, to the best of my belief, for from $1.25 to $1.75 per 100 pounds, and I believe the average would be about $1.50.

In a letter written by Mr. Moriz Weinrich, of Yonkers, N. Y., and which appears on page 340 of the testimony, Mr. Weinrich states that he has spent his life in the sugar business, farming, manufacturing, and refining. Mr. Weinrich states that he has been in Cuba five times—from 1868 to 1894—when he made a trip through the sugar districts of the island as a delegate of the Central Association of Austrian Sugar Manufacturers.

Mr. Weinrich states that he spent from a few weeks to five months on each trip. These trips were made in 1868, a few weeks; 1890, 2 months; 1891, 4 months; 1892, 4 months, and 1894, and it is fair to presume that some progress has been made in the matter of reducing the cost of production of sugar in Cuba since his last trip, eight years ago.

Mr. Weinrich says:

A sugar planter who owns a large tract of such land in Cuba near the coast, with good shipping facilities, who cultivates his own cane and owns a large factory equipped with the best machinery, can produce, under good management and everything calculated on a cash basis, a ton of cane delivered to the factory for about $1.25.

The working expenses, including wear and tear, bags, freight to wharf, etc., will be, in a factory working 150,000 tons or more per campaign, not more than $1.25 per ton, so that the total expenses would not exceed $2.50 per ton of cane.

With a yield of 11 per cent of raw sugar, 1 pound of such sugar would cost 1¼ cents per pound, which price would be yet a little shaded by utilizing the molasses.

For the nine months ending September 30, 1899, we paid Cuba $261,332 for molasses alone; for the same period in 1900, $581,114, and for the same period in 1801, $1,216,125, which substantiates the statement of Mr. Weinrich.

On page 168 of the testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means there is reproduced an article from the above-named paper, the article being written by Mr. Dureau himself.

In this article Mr. Dureau states:

We can figure that with properly constructed plants and intelligent technical control Cuba can produce sugar at 1½ cents per pound. * * * If Cuban sugar is to enjoy a reduction in the tariff in the United States it should not be difficult to picture the enormous impetus the Cuban industry would take on.

In a report made by the British consul-general to Cuba to his home Government, and which report appeared in the November (1901) issue of the International Sugar Journal, of Manchester, England, a leading British sugar authority, the consul-general says concerning the Cuban sugar industry:

First. Cost of cane.—A large part of the cane now produced in Cuba is grown by "colonos," or small farmers, who sell it to the central factories. It is usually paid for in kind, the colonos receiving 5 pounds of sugar at the port of shipment for every 100 pounds of cane delivered at the mill. This rate is, of course, not invariable. In a few districts as much as 6 pounds is paid for the 100 pounds of cane, and in others the haulage of the cane to the mill is paid by the mill owner. But it is in sufficiently general use to be accepted as a standard.

In a well-managed factory it may be estimated, for purposes of rough calculation, that it requires 10 tons of cane to produce 1 ton of sugar. Hence, at the rate just given, half the sugar produced has to be applied to paying for the cane.

Second. Cost of manufacture.—In the property under consideration the total annual expenses, excluding only the cost of the cane and the freight of the sugar, amounted in 1898 to $18.50, Spanish gold, per ton of sugar made, and were gradually reduced until, in 1898, they came out at only $15, making an average cost over the whole period of $16.50 per ton. This figure includes repairs to the machinery.

Third. Freight on sugar.—The railway freight during the same period averaged $3 per ton.

From the above we see that the consul-general gives the average cost of production, laid down at port of shipment, from 1898 to 1901, at $1.61 per 100 pounds, American currency, and for the year 1901, $1.486 per 100 pounds in well-managed factories.

THE "DEUTSCHE ZUCKER INDUSTRIE" (GERMAN SUGAR INDUSTRY).

In the November, 1901, issue of the above-named paper, published at Berlin, Germany, one of the leading German authorities on the sugar industry, appears a special report from its agent in Cuba. In this report it is stated (p. 2042):

It is well known to-day that as soon as the Cuban sugar industry shall be established and carried on under modern methods that country will produce sugar at a price not exceeding 1½ cents per pound.

SWORN STATEMENT OF THE ROSARIO SUGAR COMPANY, OF NEW YORK, OPERATING A SUGAR ESTATE IN CUBA.

The sworn statement of this company, rendered the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission, on the basis of 60,000 bags output of sugar, shows that the sugar costs this company $1.685.

A summary of the testimony and statements of sugar producers as above shows:

C. F. Saylor, United States Government (average)	$1.50
Moriz Weinrich (Austro-American refiner and manufacturer)	1.122
George Dureau (leading French expert)	1.25
British consul-general to Cuba (1901)	1.486
Expert of the Deutsche Zucker Industrie	1.25
Average of above	1.322
Constancia Sugar Company (of New York and Cuba)	1.66
Rosario Sugar Company (of New York and Cuba)	1.685
Average of all	1.422

The above testimony by experts of America, France, Germany, Austria, England, and Cuba, all of the greatest sugar-producing nations in the world, should be conclusive proof that sugar can be, and is being, produced in Cuba for less than 1½ cents per pound.

This ought to be sufficient to prove that the claim of anticipated distress, which the distinguished gentleman from New York makes with so much vigor and force, is not based upon the truth as to the cost of producing sugar in Cuba, In other words, the statements made by the Cubans themselves as to the average cost of producing sugar are disproved by their own sworn statements in relation to that cost when they are claiming damages from our Government for the loss of profits on account of the Cuban rebellion instead of asking for tariff concessions.

ANOTHER CUBAN MISREPRESENTATION EXPOSED.

But there is another fact which disproves the claim of anticipated distress. When the Cuban witnesses were before our committee we were told that because of the low price of sugar and the cost of production relief would have to be given immediately or the entire crop would not be harvested.

The relief was not given; the crop is harvested. It is all ground and bagged and is now lying upon the wharves and docks and in the storehouses at the various Cuban ports awaiting a reduction of the duty, when it will be shipped into our market. If there was any danger of distress on account of hard times, want of money, or from any other cause, these planters, if they are the ones who will derive the benefit of this proposed reduction, could not possibly hold their entire sugar crop awaiting a higher price as the result of our action. Many of us have seen the farmers of this country produce their crops and sell them for less than the cost of production. We know, too, that when the farmer is in financial distress, when he has no longer money or credit, he does not garner his wheat, his oats, or his corn awaiting a higher market—he disposes of it. He is obliged to do so to provide himself and family with the necessaries of life or to meet his indebtedness. We also know that when they can afford to hold their crop in anticipation of a higher market they are not suffering, do not anticipate the foreclosure of mortgages, and are able to commence preparing the soil for another crop.

The same is true of the sugar-cane farmer of Cuba. If there is danger of distress, if he fears or is threatened with the loss of his property through foreclosure, then he has disposed of his sugar, and he would not be the beneficiary of this proposed reduction. Hence this bill will not prevent this anticipated distress.

But, again, we are told by the witnesses before our committee that at least two-thirds of the sugar crop is produced by corporations chartered in the United States and by nonresident Spanish planters. Some of these plantations owned by American corporations embrace as high as 77,000 acres. We are also told that up to January of this year, when the hearing of testimony began, the production of sugar in the island of Cuba has been profitable. Is it to be supposed that these corporations and wealthy nonresident planters would allow their sugar mills to remain idle and their plantations to grow up in weeds rather than suffer a small loss in consequence of the low price of sugar, or would they not go on, as the American farmer does cultivate and harvest the crop that is now growing, hoping for better trade conditions, and thus continue in their employ the people now employed and prevent greater loss by deterioration and depreciation in the value of their property than they would sustain even if they were obliged to sell their next year's crop without a profit.

There is, therefore, absolutely no ground upon which to base the anticipated distress that some very distinguished gentlemen now pretend to fear and upon which they place the necessity for the passage of this proposed bill.

The plea to the American sugar consumer and the plea of anticipated distress rest, therefore, upon nothing whatever except misrepresentations of fact, and is unworthy of consideration in connection with a measure fraught with such serious consequences to the American people and to a prosperous American industry. [Applause.]

WE HAVE NOT DEPRIVED CUBA OF ANY MARKET.

But it is now claimed that by our intervention to secure the independence of Cuba, an intervention that has cost the American people more than $300,000,000 and thousands of the lives of the best youth of our land, we have deprived Cuba of her market for the profitable sale of her products.

Again is this claim disproved by the testimony of the Cuban witnesses themselves. It is said that the tobacco industry of Cuba is far more prosperous at this time than at any time during the last quarter of a century; that while they have not exported as much tobacco to the United States as they did under reciprocity, yet they received for last year's crop almost double the price they received during 1893, which was their best year in our market. They admit that this is not their only market for the sale of their tobacco, that they sell it in almost every market of the world. We have therefore not deprived them of any market whatever. As to the sale of sugar, their star witness, Mr. Atkins, a Boston merchant, Cuban sugar planter, and stockholder in the American sugar refining trust, disposes of this question most effectively in his answer to the following question:

Mr. TAWNEY. What market do you claim Cuba has lost by reason of the war?

Mr. ATKINS. We have not lost any market, but—

Now, I call the attention of the House to this language, because it not only shows the motive behind this proposed legislation, but also that to give these Cuban sugar barons what they want we must abandon the policy of developing our sugar-producing industry—

We have not lost any market, but we have lost the possibility of selling sugars at a remunerative price, and that was brought about largely by the course of the United States in stimulating the production of her domestic sugars.

Think of it, gentlemen! These wealthy American sugar planters in Cuba, these speculators upon alleged distress, have lost the opportunity of selling their sugar at a remunerative price, and they tell us that one of the causes is that we have been stimulating the production of domestic sugar. But how have we done this? By protective-tariff duties on sugar. Hence, they ask us to reduce these duties, stop encouraging our domestic sugar industry that they may sell their sugar in our market at a larger profit. A higher tribute was never paid to the policy of protection. This reason for asking and favoring a reduction of the duty on sugar is the best reason for retaining that duty. Since the enactment of the Dingley law, less than five years ago, the production of beet sugar has increased in the United States 460 per cent, and in the last year has increased 140 per cent. Because of this enormous increase in the production of beet sugar in this country the Cubans have lost, Mr. Atkins tells us, the opportunity for the sale of sugar at remunerative prices. And now the Republican leaders in this House propose, at the instance and for the benefit of these buccaneers in a foreign land, to reduce the duty on raw sugar and put an end to the further development of our domestic sugar industry. [Applause.]

I want to call your attention, too, to the significant fact that this same Mr. Atkins testified that up until the day he stood before our committee the sugar-producing business in Cuba had been profitable, and when he was asked to tell the committee how much it cost him to produce a ton of sugar in his factory he declined to answer. Let me read that portion of his testimony:

Mr. TAWNEY. What does it cost you per ton to put your cane into the factory?

Mr. ATKINS. As an individual?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it quite fair to ask the cost of individual production?

Mr. METCALF. You started out this morning, Mr. Atkins, to give us the cost per ton of sugar cane, and I think you placed that cost at $2.50. Is that correct?

Mr. ATKINS. They asked the question what it cost to deliver a ton of sugar cane at the mills, in my opinion. I told them that I had no figures whatever upon which to base the cost, but in a general statement I believed it was between $2.25 and $2.50.

Mr. METCALF. As a prudent business man, I suppose you keep an accurate account of the cost to you?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes.

Mr. METCALF. Have you any objection to stating what that cost is?

Mr. ATKINS. I prefer not to expose my own private accounts before the committee.

Notwithstanding the foregoing testimony he claims he can not produce sugar under present conditions at a profit, and at the same time refuses to give Congress the information upon which we could base an intelligent judgment whether or not his statements in that regard are true. He declines to give any evidence at all as to the cost of production in his own factory. And why was it? It was because he knew that to do so he would give the lie to his own statements—that the Cubans "have lost the possibility of selling sugar at a remunerative price." That was not only true of Mr. Atkins, but it was true of several other of the great sugar planters who appeared before our committee, and it is upon this evasive, unreliable, and false testimony that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means bases his judgment that there is danger of anticipated distress in the island of Cuba, and that therefore we should pass this bill.

THE AMERICAN PRODUCER NOT A WHINER.

It has often happened in this country that the American producers have not had the opportunity of selling their products, either agricultural or manufactured, at a remunerative price, but they have not whined about it. They have not come to Congress asking specific legislation for the purpose of relieving them from a trade condition for which the Government was not responsible; and when the American Congress starts out upon the policy of legislation the effect of which will be to curtail the domestic production of a given industry that the product of a like industry in a foreign country may be sold in our market at a remunerative price, is it not time that some one should call a halt before we have gone too far in the matter of knight-errantry and in the matter of extending sympathy and aid and prosperity to a foreign people at the expense of American industries and American citizens?

THE PLATT AMENDMENT.

Having themselves disposed of the plea that we have deprived Cuba of a market for the sale of her sugar and other products, they then retreat to what they regard as an impregnable position—the Platt amendment and certain vague and indefinite promises said to have been made by certain officials of our Government respecting commercial union in consideration of Cuba accepting that amendment. Upon this ground they have endeavored to fortify and defend themselves behind the breastworks of national honor. They and their friends upon this floor tell us that under that amendment, which the Cuban constitutional convention voluntarily accepted, the sovereignty of Cuba has been restricted, and that this restriction will necessarily limit commercial and industrial prosperity, because the island will not be free to negotiate treaties with other countries favorable to her trade in such countries.

To show how, like on other questions, they have attempted to convey to the American Congress an erroneous impression upon this question, if not to deceive, I want to quote again from the testimony of Mr. Mendoza, page 412 of the hearings:

Mr. METCALF. You spoke of the Platt amendment as preventing you from entering into commercial treaties with any other country.

Mr. MENDOZA. Yes, sir.

Mr. METCALF. Senator PLATT informed me yesterday that he had such a provision in the original amendment, but that that was stricken out.

Mr. MENDOZA. That is the way we all understood it in Cuba. I do not know what you intend to do, but that is the way we understand it.

Mr. DALZELL. The Platt amendment will not bear the construction you put upon it.

A more hypocritical claim was never made in support of an unrighteous cause. Those who rely upon it know there is no act, either national or international, that the sovereign republic of Cuba, under the Platt amendment, can not do or perform that any of the republics of South or Central America are at liberty to do. She can make any treaty with any nation on earth and we can not prevent it, unless such treaty impairs the independence of Cuba. Nor can any of the republics to the south of us, under the Monroe doctrine, impair by treaty their independence or transfer their sovereignty to any European power unless we abandon that venerable American doctrine.

BENEFITS OF RECIPROCITY THEIR FINAL GROUND.

It was not until it became necessary to shift their position, first from that Cuban distress and the reduction of the price of sugar to the American consumer to anticipated distress, and then to the destruction of Cuba's markets, and from that to something else, that the Platt amendment and the alleged promise of practically commercial union with Cuba was brought forward by those who commenced this agitation and who now favor the pending proposition. But when the Platt amendment was analyzed and it was plainly shown that it does not operate as a restriction upon the independence or sovereignty or the commerce of Cuba, that it provides in this respect merely that Cuba shall never enter into a treaty with a foreign nation which will impair her independence; that no debt or obligation shall be assumed that the revenues of the island shall be inadequate to liquidate; that Cuba shall give consent for the United States to intervene to preserve the independence of the island, it then became necessary to find some other ground upon which to base this proposition.

Having failed on the sympathy argument, the moral argument, and the national-honor argument, the friends of this proposition now base their argument upon reciprocity and the extension of American trade in Cuba as a justification for the passage of this bill. In other words, they now base their whole argument on the ground that the benefits that will inure to the people of the United States from the reciprocity provisions of this proposed measure will be sufficient to justify our enacting it. This claim is also supported by the hysterical cry of some of our home interests for trade, principally New York exporters who rest their hope of increased sales upon theory rather than upon facts. [Applause.]

POSSIBLE INCREASE IN OUR TRADE NOT MORE THAN $14,000,000.

In his testimony before the committee, and according to statistics, Colonel Bliss stated that Cuba bought last year from foreign countries $34,962,000 worth of certain articles and from the United States of like articles only $10,360,000. These articles he groups into six classes. He then proceeds to say that we can get this $34,962,000 of trade, in his judgment, if we go after it.

On page 406 of the testimony, under the head of "miscellaneous," he places—

Cattle:
Imports from the United States	$1,260,335
From all other countries	6,020,087

Of the $7,280,422, Mexico, Columbia, and Venezuela furnish $5,422,357, the United States $1,260,335, leaving small margins for all other countries.

There is a reason for the importation of cattle from Mexico and South American countries, which Colonel Bliss himself, in his official report, August 1, 1899, tells us, and that is principally climatic conditions. American cattle do not live any length of time on that island.

So that here is $5,442,000 of the $34,962,000 Cuban trade we can not get.

Under "Fibers, etc.," page 405 of the record, Colonel Bliss gives the United States about $495,000 worth of cotton goods exported to Cuba; from all other nations, about $6,000,000. There is likewise a reason for our not having more of this trade to-day. Certainly it is not the high rate of duty or because of any discriminating rate of duty, but because, as Colonel Bliss himself stated before the committee, we do not make what Cuba wants, nor do we give the same credit to her merchants that European manufacturers do, nor do we sell as cheaply. It is therefore our own fault or the fault of our manufacturers that we are not selling more cotton goods to Cuba than we are to-day. The domestic sugar and tobacco industries should not be loaded down for the neglect, refusal, or poor business methods of our own manufacturers.

In proof of this I quote from the recently elected president of Cuba, Señor Palma, who says:

> English and German manufacturers of cotton goods make a study of the tastes and needs of the people living in Cuba, and as a result they sell to them in great quantities. It is only necessary for the American manufacturers to bring their good judgment to bear upon this matter, to make a study of the needs of the consumers, and they can take all of this trade to themselves.

There is no word here about the necessity for a preferential tariff to secure more of Cuba's trade.

Mr. Pepper, a very able newspaper correspondent, representing in Cuba a syndicate of newspapers favoring this proposed reduction of duty, who is now in Habana, and is also the special correspondent of the Washington Star, recently said in one of his articles:

> When the American exporters and manufacturers learn that there is a limit to what their own Government can do in providing a Cuban market for them, and when they learn also that tropical trade is not to be won by haphazard unloading of surplus products and damaged goods, they will be on the right road to selling their products. But they will not be able to overcome German competition until they show the same patience that the Germans show and adapt their goods to the market as the Germans do.

Mr. Pepper does not here attribute our failure to secure the Cuban market either to a high rate of duty on the products of Cuba coming into the United States or to the rate of duty on the products of the United States entering Cuba. There is no intimation by him, a man who has studied trade conditions there in the interests of Americans, that a preferential duty is necessary to our securing the full Cuban trade.

We exported of cotton manufactures in ten months ending October, 1901, to all nations, about $37,500,000. That being so, why is it that our cotton manufacturers do not get the trade in Cuba as they are getting it in other foreign countries? Is it because of those things stated by Señor Palmer and Mr. Pepper and Mr. Bliss and others? If it is, then it is their own fault, and there is nothing in the trade relations between the United States and Cuba to prevent them from increasing that trade without a preferential tariff. So that we have now reduced the $34,000,000 which Colonel Bliss says we can get by reciprocity to $23,000,000.

In another group of articles imported into Cuba is about $2,000,000 worth of vegetables; $868,000 from the United States and $1,225,000 from other nations. Of the latter Cuba takes of onions, canned vegetables, and pulse about $468,600 of Spain. There are no doubt reasons to be found for this fact in the contracted habit and taste for these vegetables grown in that country. Certain it is that we can not get that trade under a 20 per cent reduction if the people in the southern part of our country, lying almost in sight of Cuba, are not able to supply that market now.

Colonel Bliss then charges against us in the same group the jerked beef or tajaso item, which is imported entirely from South and Central America, and which we can not supply. Because of climatic conditions, the use of meat in other forms, unless salted or smoked, to any great extent is not possible. Our consul at Buenos Ayres and also our minister to Argentina confirm this statement in official reports to the State Department.

Colonel Bliss then puts into his calculation the item of coffee, amounting in the aggregate to $768,740—an article that we do not produce.

Deducting, then, these several items, it reduces our possible trade in Cuba to $20,000,000.

The item of cheese, amounting to $401,410, imported largely from the Netherlands, is also placed against us. This item, like the item of vegetables imported from Spain, Cuba would continue to import from the Netherlands, because her people want the article and are accustomed to it by habit and taste.

This reduces our possible trade in the island to $19,600,000.

Another item charged against us is the item of $3,300,000 worth of rice. This rice is consumed by the poorer classes, and is furnished to them largely by the sugar and tobacco planters. Who believes for one moment that these planters could import rice from Louisiana, costing twice as much as the rice which they import from other countries, for their employees? According to the testimony of Mr. Placé the rice that is imported into Cuba and consumed by her people is the poor and cheap India rice. We would, therefore, have little, if anything, to hope for in increased trade in this article.

This reduces the possibilities of increased trade with Cuba to $16,300,000.

Another item which it is claimed would be imported from the United States under reciprocity is the item of $1,200,000 worth of fibers. Manufactures of fiber imported into Cuba come almost entirely from Great Britain, and I suppose that they import their fibers from that country for the same reason that we do, because they furnish what Cuba wants, in the style they want it, cheaper than we do and with more extended credit.

Another item is $1,320,000 of leather and manufactures of. We are materially increasing our trade in the sale of articles of this kind in Cuba and because our manufacturers of shoes and other articles manufactured from leather are studying the necessities of this trade in the island, and in consequence are rapidly taking it from Spain, but it will not be for some time that this trade can be secured.

From these facts you will observe that Colonel Bliss's statements as to the extent to which our trade can be increased in Cuba is reduced to about $14,000,000.

EXTENT TO WHICH WE NOW CONTROL CUBAN TRADE.

Another Cuban witness who endeavored to impress upon us the advantage to American producers of reciprocity with Cuba, was Mr. Placé, and to show how extravagant and unreliable were the statements of this witness I will quote from his testimony and from the statistics of the Treasury Department.

On page 91 of Statements to Ways and Means Committee, Mr. Placé said that during reciprocity (1891–1894) Cuba imported from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 worth of machinery from the United States.

His misstatements concerning Cuba's importation of cotton goods consisted in this, that Cuba's total importations thereof was $67,000,000 (p. 93), which in fact were only $7,000,000 from all countries, and I think it proper, too, to expose his false statement concerning our machinery exports to Cuba under reciprocity.

The figures are from our Bureau of Statistics, to wit: Total exports of machinery from the United States to Cuba for four years, 1891–1894, inclusive, $7,649,752.

I give the figures and others, in order that we may contrast this trade with other years:

1883, machinery n. e. s., from United States	$1,167,516
1884, machinery n. e. s., from United States	1,217,196
1890, machinery n. e. s., from United States	1,154,090
1891 (reciprocity), from United States	1,317,256
1892 (reciprocity), n. e. s., from United States	1,952,740
1893 (reciprocity), n. e. s., from United States	2,792,050
1894 (reciprocity), n. e. s., from United States	1,587,706
1895 (reciprocity abrogated), United States	1,286,473
Steam engines and parts:
1890	435,152
1891 (reciprocity)	469,839
1892 (reciprocity)	807,435
1893 (reciprocity)	871,712
1894 (reciprocity)	503,802
1894 (abrogated)	353,568

So that taking our best year under reciprocity (1893), and we have of machinery sold to Cuba $2,792,050 plus $871,712, and we have in that year only $3,663,762; and taking our total machinery trade to Cuba, 1891–1894, and we will have of machinery n. e. s. for four years, $7,649,752; and steam engines and parts, $2,655,788; a total in four years of only $10,325,540, or only one-fourth of what Place said it was.

In 1901 our total machinery exports to Cuba were about $2,000,000.

Under reciprocity in four years, 1891–1894, the United States sent of boots and shoes to Cuba, $468,000; while in two years, 1899–1900, we sent $453,000.

We did not send as much glass and glassware to Cuba in our best year (1893) under reciprocity by $40,000 as we did in 1900.

We sent only $170,000 worth more of corn to Cuba in our best (1893) reciprocity year than we did in 1898.

We sent no more agricultural implements to Cuba in 1893–94 under reciprocity than in 1890, nor as much in 1893–94 by $55,000 as in 1900. We sent of cotton manufactures to Cuba in 1899–1900 (two years) $892,850. In our two best reciprocity years (1893–94) our total was only $132,770. In 1899–1900 (two years) our total drugs, chemicals, dyes, and medicines exports to Cuba were $809,000. Our total under reciprocity (1893–94) was only $578,000.

There was under reciprocity in 1893–94 a gain in our exports to Cuba of nails and spikes over 1900 of about $30,000; in builder's hardware of about $200,000, but in 1894 only $90,000 over 1890.

Our total fish exports to Cuba were not as large under any reciprocity year (except in 1893) as in 1899—$170,800 against $125,800.

And the same was true of our mineral-oil exports. As to malt liquors, while our total for two years, 1899–1900, was $1,219,000, in 1891–1894 (under reciprocity) the total was only $167,700. Our total paper exports to Cuba in two years (1899–1900) were $327,000; the total in our two best reciprocity years (1893–94) was only $312,600. Our export of bacon to Cuba in 1900 over the best reciprocity year nearly doubled in pounds, while our exports of ham exceeded in 1900 our best reciprocity year by 1,200,000 pounds. Our pork exports to Cuba in 1900 (one year) were 6,000,000 pounds, against a total of only 2,640,000 pounds in the four reciprocity years, 1891–1894. The United States sent more boards, deals, joists, planks, etc., to Cuba in 1900 than in any year under reciprocity by $40,000 in value, and this is also substantially true of timber.

We sent as much furniture to Cuba ($603,670) in 1900 as in the entire four reciprocity years of 1891–1894.

CUBA'S TOTAL COMMERCE.

The total commerce of Cuba in 1890 was $152,362,484; her total exports to all countries about $100,000,000, and her total imports about $52,362,484. The greater part of her exports came to the United States in the form of sugar, molasses, and tobacco. From 1876 to 1891 the United States purchased of Cuba of raw products $923,888,357, and we sent to Cuba only $188,695,845, leaving a balance of trade against the United States in sixteen years of $735,192,512.

In 1891 our imports from Cuba consisted of—

Sugar and molasses	$46,830,047
Fruits	1,619,467
Chemicals and dye woods	369,617
Hides and skins	345,633
Cabinet woods	576,953
Iron ore	847,250
Tobacco	10,484,604
Total	61,073,621

CUBA'S IMPORTS.

United States, 1893, under reciprocity	$24,157,698
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901:
United States	28,561,140
Great Britain	9,280,950
France	2,922,830
Germany	3,403,000
Spain	10,268,260

Showing that notwithstanding "reciprocity" between the United States and Cuba from September, 1892, until October, 1894, our trade with the island now is over $4,000,000 more than our best reciprocity year.

We almost entirely monopolize Cuba's market with certain products.

Agricultural implements, about 62 per cent—in fact, with nearly all her plows and cultivators.

Horses: We furnish about 50 per cent; others from Mexico principally, for similar reasons as to climate.

Mules: We furnish over 75 per cent of her mules.

Hogs, 95 per cent from United States.

Corn, 99 per cent from United States.

Bran and fodder, 89 per cent from United States.

Oats, 98 per cent from United States.

Brick, 90 per cent from United States.

Cars (railway and street), 99½ per cent from United States.

Coal, 99 per cent from United States.

Hay, 90 per cent from United States.

Instruments (scientific), 90 per cent from United States.

Steel and steel rails, 88 per cent from United States.

Structural iron and steel, 99½ per cent from United States.

Agricultural and electrical machinery, 98 per cent from United States.

Sewing machines, 90 per cent from United States.

Steam engines, locomotives, stationary engines, and boilers, 62 per cent from United States.

Sugar machinery, 93 per cent from United States.

All other machinery, 88 per cent from United States.

Flour, all from the United States.

Builders' hardware, 52 per cent from the United States.

Tools and implements, 61 per cent from the United States.

Tin, United States and Great Britain about divide the trade.

Paints, nearly 50 per cent from the United States.

Paper, and manufactures of, the United States, Germany, France, and Spain divide the trade.

Malt liquors, about 71 per cent from the United States.

Meats (salt and pickled), 50 per cent from the United States.

Beef, canned, all from United States.

Beef, fresh, all from United States.

Beef, salt or pickled, all from the United States; jerked or tajaso, nearly all of Uruguay.

Bacon, nearly all from the United States.

Hams and shoulders, nearly all from United States.

Pork, salt or pickled, nearly all from United States.

Lard, nearly all from United States.

Oleomargarine, nearly all from United States.

Condensed milk, nearly all from United States.

Butter, United States, Denmark, and Spain divide the trade.

Cheese, mostly from the Netherlands. (Matter of taste, probably.)

Rice, from Great Britain and Germany, $3,100,000.

Beans and peas, 60 per cent from United States.

Potatoes, 55 per cent from United States.

Wood, (a) boards, shingles, shooks, logs, lumber, and timber, nearly all from United States; (b) furniture, nearly all from United States; (c) hogsheads, all from United States and Spain.

REDUCTION OF SUGAR DUTY FOR RECIPROCITY MEANS EXCHANGING ANNUALLY A $150,000,000 SUGAR MARKET FOR $14,000,000 ADDITIONAL TRADE IN CUBA.

The statements of Colonel Bliss and others, however, as to the possibility of increasing our trade in Cuba to the extent of $34,000,000 annually, and all arguments in favor of reciprocity are based upon a permanent reciprocity treaty, not upon a reciprocity treaty that would expire by limitation within about eighteen months after it was executed.

Under this proposed reciprocity plan for the relief of Cuba, therefore, we would get absolutely nothing in the way of increased trade, and even under permanent reciprocity we could not hope for any material increase in our trade for many years.

If, as I believe, it is the purpose and the intent to ultimately make this, either now or in the near future, a permanent arrangement in the event that it now becomes a law, there would still be no adequate compensation growing out of increased trade with Cuba for the loss we would sustain by reason of a reduction of duty on raw sugar.

To my mind, Mr. Chairman, this proposition is a monstrous one and is not worthy of consideration in an American Congress. It is a fact that $82.13 is the benefit accruing to the American farmer, laborer, mechanic, manufacturer, railroad company, by the production of one ton of granulated sugar, direct from American-grown beets. This would aggregate, on the basis our importations of raw sugar last year, not including Hawaii, $150,804,724 annually. There is a market at home worth annually to our people more than $150,000,000 which it is proposed to sacrifice to obtain an increase in our trade in Cuba of about $14,000,000. To me this looks like exchanging a dollar and a half for fourteen cents. [Applause.] In addition to this, there would accrue to the allied American industries, resulting from the cost of erecting the 520 beet-sugar factories necessary to produce this sugar at home, an aggregate benefit amounting to at least $285,220,000. And there would accrue also to American industry annually, by reason of necessary repairs and improvements on these factories (5 per cent of the original cost), $14,261,000. In other words, the benefit inuring to American industry from the repair of the sugar factories alone, if we produced all the sugar we consumed, would more than equal the increase in our trade with Cuba under a permanent reciprocity arrangement.

THE PROPOSED RECIPROCITY NOT IN LINE WITH REPUBLICAN RECIPROCITY.

The claim made upon this floor that reciprocity with Cuba is in line with Republican policies and the effort made to sustain that claim, based upon the fact that under the McKinley law we had a reciprocity treaty with Cuba, is no nearer the truth than are the representations made by certain newspapers in this country and by the Cubans themselves concerning distress, poverty, and general industrial collapse in Cuba. It is true we had under the McKinley law a reciprocity treaty with Cuba, but that treaty was not in conflict with the policy of developing American industries.

No industry then in the infancy of its development was affected by that treaty except the sugar industry, and to insure protection to that industry against the cheap labor and production of sugar in Cuba, and also to encourage the development of our domestic sugar industry, the McKinley law provided for the payment of a bounty of 2 cents a pound on every pound of sugar produced in the United States. This was for the purpose of equalizing the difference in the cost of producing sugar here and in Cuba, and under the stimulus thus afforded our domestic industry it did develop, notwithstanding the free importation of sugar from the island of Cuba. It is, therefore, unfair to cite the reciprocity treaty with Cuba under the McKinley law as a justification for a reciprocity agreement with Cuba now without the aid of a bounty or anything to further encourage the development of the sugar-producing industry of the United States.

It is also claimed that under the Dingley law express authority was given for the making of a reciprocity agreement with Cuba, as well as with other countries, upon a basis of the reduction of the duty on sugar, and this fact is also cited as a justification for the passage of this proposed reciprocity bill. But gentlemen fail to also call attention to the fact that the reciprocity agreements authorized by the existing Dingley law could not become effective if negotiated within the life of the reciprocity provision of that law until they were ratified and approved by both Houses of Congress. If under section 4 of this law a reciprocity agreement had been negotiated with Cuba, it would thereafter have been necessary to secure the approval of both Houses of Congress in order to make it operative, and that approval could no more have been secured without a contest such as we are now engaged in than the proposition to expressly authorize a reciprocity agreement involving a reduction of the duty on sugar, as proposed by this bill.

The reciprocity policy of the Republican party, a policy which has been styled by the President as "the handmaiden of protection," does not contemplate the exchange of an American market which we ourselves can supply for any foreign market. It does not justify a Republican Congress in reducing the duty on a product which we ourselves can produce in quantities sufficient to supply our own demand, or the reduction of the duty on products the protection of which in our own market will give employment to labor and capital universally throughout our land and to an extent that would equal the employment of labor and capital in the greatest industry we have to-day. But that is what the proposed reciprocity provided for in this bill contemplates.

THE PROPOSED REDUCTION OF DUTY WOULD DESTROY FUTURE DEVELOPMENT OF SUGAR INDUSTRY.

But it is claimed that a 20 per cent reduction of the duty on sugar will not injure the domestic industry, and this claim is made by the very men who adopted the present law imposing the existing duty on sugar for the protection and development of that industry. If that is so, then you are by your own act confirming the truth of the argument so frequently made by the free trader that the duties which you imposed less than five years ago upon this product and the products of other industries were placed unnecessarily high, and that thereby you have imposed burdens upon the American people which under your own policy of protection you are not justified in doing.

I deny the claim that the duty upon raw sugar was placed either knowingly or unwittingly above the point necessary to insure the growth and development of the domestic sugar-producing industry. When the present law was prepared and reported to the House, March 19, 1897, the late Hon. Nelson Dingley, then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, than whom no more sincere or able advocate of Republican principles and Republican policies ever occupied a seat upon this floor, said in his report concerning the necessity for the present duty on raw sugar, and at that time prophesied as follows:

> The production of beet sugar in at least 23 States of our Union, which only seven years ago was regarded as of doubtful promise, is no longer an experiment, but a demonstrated success with such protection as we recommend, which is less than those bounties given at the inception of sugar production by Germany, France, and other European countries which now produce about two-thirds of the world's sugar.
> The time has come when every effort should be made to open up new crops to our farmers and thus diversify and promote our agriculture; and no crop in sight affords more hope of success or greater advantages to the whole country. Even with the present low prices of sugar, we paid in the last fiscal year to foreign countries about $73,000,000 for our raw sugar, in addition to over $11,000,000 paid to the Sandwich Islands for sugars imported free of duty under our treaty of reciprocity with that country; and in the near future this sum will rise to $100,000,000. To open up such a new and valuable crop to our farmers (who are finding the competition of Russian and Argentina wheat a serious drawback) is a boon which Congress should not hesitate to give, especially at a time when it can be done in the interest of revenue.

I might quote from the speech made in this House by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] on the 19th day of July, 1897, to prove that the duty imposed by the existing law upon raw sugar was necessary to the development of our sugar-producing industry, and also to show how he predicted that industry would grow and prosper under the existing duty until in a few years we would be producing all the sugar we consume, instead of sending abroad annually from the pockets of our own people more than $100,000,000 to the producers of sugar in foreign countries.

PARTY PLEDGES PRIOR AND SUBSEQUENT TO SPANISH WAR.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] says that since that time conditions have changed, and that these new conditions, resulting from the Spanish-American war, must be met. He said a few days ago in opening this debate:

> I did not think that we would have Porto Rico and the Philippines and Cuba upon our hands in any degree within the space of five years when I made that speech.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], in the Fifty-sixth Congress, made another speech, in which he referred to these changed conditions, and also referred to our domestic sugar-producing industry and what the purpose of the Republican party was and would be in dealing with these new conditions as they affected the production of sugar in this country. That speech was delivered on the 19th of February, 1900, on the passage of what was known as the Porto Rico revenue bill. In speaking of the effect of the reduction of the duty on sugar and tobacco coming from Porto Rico, he then said:

> We consumed 2,000,000 tons of sugar last year. We imported about 1,400,000 tons on which we paid duty. We also imported 300,000 tons from Hawaii, which came in free of duty. The balance was produced in this country. Our increased consumption amounts to from fifty to a hundred thousand tons annually. If this 60,000 tons comes in from Porto Rico it will be but a drop in the bucket. Even should it double in quantity it could have no influence on our market. Our sugar producers have nothing to fear if we stop with sugar from Porto Rico at the duty in this bill.
> Nor will this bill injure the tobacco industry. Their tobacco is quite different from ours. The best of it ranks with the Cuban, or nearly so. Nearly all of it is filler tobacco and very little is fit for wrappers. My own impression is that it will add to the sale of wrappers in the United States and make a better market for our tobacco growers. I have yet to see the tobacco man who fears the introduction of the Porto Rican product.
> Their great fear is that if we should give free trade to Porto Rico we would follow it with free trade with the Philippine Islands, and ultimately with Cuba. Neither they nor the sugar producers fear anything from Porto Rico alone, and when Congress asserts its power under the Constitution to deal in the manner proposed by this bill with this territory it gives them renewed confidence to believe that Congress has the power and can be trusted to care for their interests when we come to deal with the other islands.

Here he claimed that the assertion of the power of Congress under the Constitution to maintain a duty upon the products of our insular possessions coming to the United States was intended to give renewed confidence to the producers of sugar and tobacco in this country; that Congress possesses the power and, while under the control of the Republican party, "can be trusted to care for their interests when we come to deal with the other islands." This was a specific pledge to our people that they should not be harmed in their domestic industries that compete with the industries of Cuba and the Philippine Islands.

This was in line with the pledge made by the Republican party in 1896 to encourage American citizens to engage in the production of sugar by the imposition of a duty high enough to accomplish that purpose. Having fulfilled that pledge by the enactment of the Dingley law, and in view of the changed conditions growing out of the result of the Spanish-American war, this assertion of power on the part of Congress, now sustained by the supreme judicial tribunal of this country, was not only intended, but it was stated then by the leader of the Republican party in this House, to be an assurance and an additional promise to the American producers of sugar that they had nothing to fear from the cheap labor and cheap production in the islands acquired by us or in the island of Cuba, whose independence we had secured.

As a further evidence of this fact, let me call your attention to what the Republican National Committee, in the Presidential campaign of 1900, said to the farmers of this country on the subject, as shown by the Republican "handbook," published and distributed by the national committee then soliciting the votes of American farmers for the candidates of the Republican party:

The first thought which came to the minds of the farmers when the events following the war for the liberation of Cuba brought under our control certain tropical areas was whether or not the possession or control of tropical territory by the United States would injure, or perhaps destroy, the opportunities which they believed they had almost within their grasp for supplying the $100,000,000 worth of sugar which the people of the United States annually consume. This fear—if it reached the stage in which it could be called by that name—was answered in the negative by the Republican party when it passed the Porto Rican bill.

The Democratic party fought with all its power to prevent the enactment of that measure which placed a duty upon articles coming into the United States from Porto Rico. That duty was small, but it was an explicit declaration by the Republican party that it proposed to retain the power to fix such tariff as it might deem judicious against the products of cheap tropical labor wherever located and under whatever conditions. In other words, it was a distinct promise to the farmer that he need not fear that the Republican party would permit the cheap labor and cheap sugar of any tropical territory to be brought in in a manner which would destroy the infant industry of beet-sugar production which the farmers of the United States have, under the fostering care of the Republican party, been building up during the last few years.

I would especially commend to the distinguished gentleman who occupies a seat at the other end of this Capitol, who was then and is now chairman of the Republican national committee, the promises and the representations he and his committee then made to the people of the United States with respect to the future action of the Republican party toward the industry which he and others are now engaged in destroying the future development of, contrary to and in violation of party pledges and party honor.

THE EAST AGAINST A WESTERN INDUSTRY.

It does not become a Republican either to assert that the present rate of duty on sugar is too high or that the industry will continue to prosper and develop under a reduced rate of duty. Certainly it does not lie in the mouth of the representatives upon this floor of Eastern manufacturing industries to say so, or to base their proposed action in this matter upon statements of that kind.

We have to-day in operation 41 beet-sugar factories in this country. All but three are located in Western and Northwestern States. Two are located in New York and one in the State of Ohio. Almost to a man the Representatives from the States in which all but three of the sugar factories are located are opposing the passage of this bill, not only because they believe it will injure their existing factories, but that it has and will destroy further development of this industry in their respective States. But they are also opposing the passage of this bill because it is for that reason a violation of party pledges and a violation of the good faith and honor of the Government now under the control of their party.

Their belief as to the effect of this proposed reduction upon the industry which they represent is not founded upon speculation. It is not founded upon false representations, as is the claim for the passage of this bill, but upon the actual effect of this threat to reduce the duty on the product of their industry, as seen by them and their people.

Who is it that assumes to tell us of the West, aye, to dictate to us the rate of duty necessary to the prosperity of the existing sugar industry and to the encouragement of its future development? It is almost entirely the representatives of Eastern manufacturing industries that have been developed and are now enjoying unparalleled prosperity under the policy of protection, industries that are to-day protected by the aid of the votes of Western Representatives against cheap foreign competition by rates of duty infinitely higher than is the duty upon raw sugar. These men pretend to favor this proposition because it is a reciprocity proposition, and, as claimed by them, will result in increasing our trade in the island of Cuba. From the statistics we have seen that the only possible increase that we may hope for is in the sale of manufactured articles, and in the sale of manufactured articles the West is not particularly interested, but the East is. Hence to increase the trade of the East in the island of Cuba the Representatives of that section are perfectly willing to reduce the duty on the product of a Western industry. But when it is proposed, for the purpose of extending the trade of Western industries or increasing the sale of the products of the Western farm in European markets by the application of this principle of reciprocity, for which the advocates of this bill are now contending, that proposition is resisted most bitterly by the very men who are insisting that our industry of the West will not suffer in consequence of this proposed reduction.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who will follow me, will argue that this proposed reduction is not a violation of the principle of protection, that it will not injuriously affect any industry. But if the sugar-producing industry of this country—an infant industry now enjoying the protection of a specific duty, the equivalent ad valorem of which is only about 80 per cent—will not suffer in consequence of a 20 per cent reduction, then I ask him why it is that he and his people, and the representatives of other Eastern and fully developed industries, are to-day resisting to the uttermost the ratification of the French reciprocity treaty now pending in the Senate, which provides for a reduction of duty of from 5 to 20 per cent on the products of Eastern manufacturing industries. I would ask him to explain to the House and to the country why it is that if this 20 per cent reduction will not jeopardize the future development of the sugar industry he opposes a proposed reduction under the French treaty of 20 per cent on the products of the glass industry—a fully developed industry—which he represents on this floor. [Applause.]

What is the equivalent ad valorem of the specific duty which the present law imposes upon glass? I read from the Senate report containing the proposed French reciprocity treaty. From this we see that upon certain specific sizes and grades of glass the duty is as high as 154.80 per cent.

Above that, and not exceeding 40 by 60 inches square, 3¾ cents per pound	145.01	130.51

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman to yield to me now.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman was speaking of the French treaty now pending in the Senate. Mr. John A. Kasson said, in an address before the Illinois manufacturers at Chicago, on October 24 of last year, "We sought not only to avoid any injury to any American industry, but so far as possible to avoid giving even cause for apprehension to any industry;" thus showing what he thought of reciprocity.

Mr. TAWNEY. That only illustrates the fact, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Kasson has been unable to convince the Eastern manufacturers that their interests will not be affected by a 20 per cent reduction of duty where that duty is now 154 per cent.

In speaking now in favor of this measure Mr. GROSVENOR has a great deal to say about this 20 per cent reduction not injuring the domestic sugar beet. But the sugar industry is not an Ohio industry, while the production of wool is. There is another reciprocity treaty pending in the Senate, entered into with the Argentine Republic, for a 20 per cent reduction on wool. The ratification of this treaty is resisted by him because he claims it would injure this industry in his State, although it provides for only a 20 per cent reduction on wool coming from that Republic. What is the ad valorem equivalent of the specific duty now placed upon wool? Let me give the committee a little information on that point and expose the inconsistency of the men who demand a reduction of 20 per cent on the product of an industry not in their State. The ad valorem rate in 1899 on unwashed wool on the skin was almost 119 per cent; on washed wool of the same class, not on the skin, 120¼, and wool of class 2, 360 per cent; in 1900, on unwashed on the skin, 103 per cent. And yet here is a struggling infant industry, having to-day less than 60 per cent ad valorem equivalent to the specific rate on sugar, paying that; and yet they tell us that the proposed reduction of 20 per cent on wool, on glass, and on other articles included in the treaties of reciprocity—treaties now pending in the Senate—would injure their industries if they were made. But they are perfectly willing that an industry that does not exist in their States, that possibly has no hope of future existence—if they can increase the sale of their manufactured products in a foreign country by sacrificing a Western industry, they are perfectly willing to do it; and they do it, too, with greater ease than I would have supposed a good Republican would even attempt the accomplishment of that which was a violation of the principles and express pledges of his party. [Applause.]

I am sorry that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has now taken his seat, was not here when I alluded to one of his pet industries, the glass industry. I would like to have him tell this House and the country why it is that, if the infant sugar-producing industry of the country can stand a 20 per cent reduction, the manufacturers of glass, an industry that is fully established and having a protection of 154 per cent, why it can not stand a like reduction of duty as proposed by the Kasson-French reciprocity treaty, why he objects so strenuously to the 20 per cent reduction on the product of the glass industry and favors this reduction on the product of the Western farm. I hope he will answer the question, but I fear my hope will be in vain.

THE REAL OBJECT OF THIS CONTEST.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter I want to call attention particularly to before I conclude my remarks. I want to call attention to the fact, my friends, that this is neither a protection nor a free-trade fight. This is a fight between two American industries. The one is controlled by the American sugar trust, the other by the American farmer. It is a life or death struggle between our domestic sugar-producing industry and the sugar-refining trust of this country. [Applause.] That is where the real fight is located. It commenced more than a year ago, and it will continue till one or the other is triumphant. The beet-sugar industry of this country refines its own sugar. The American Sugar Refining Company does nothing but refine raw sugar imported from and produced in foreign countries. In ten years we can produce, if our sugar-producing industry is let alone, all the sugar we consume. That sugar will be refined in the beet-sugar factory, hence the importation of raw sugar from foreign countries and the business of refining that sugar by the American sugar-refining trust will cease except, perhaps, as to the importation of raw cane sugar from our island possessions.

THE WAR OF THE TRUST IN 1901 AGAINST DOMESTIC INDUSTRY.

I am not surprised, therefore, at the efforts of the trust to crush out, if it can, the beet-sugar industry. It began its war of extermination a little over a year ago when it invaded the territory of the beet-sugar industry of Colorado and Nebraska, offering its sugar in the valley of the Missouri for 2½ cents a pound less than it was charging for the same article at its factory in Brooklyn, N. Y. At that time the press of this country teemed with editorials not only describing minutely the character and purpose of this war of the sugar trust on the beet-sugar industry but also denouncing this gigantic monopoly for the unscrupulous methods which it employed to accomplish its unworthy end.

It is indeed strange that these same newspapers do not see in this contest the same mailed hand they discovered last year in the effort of the trust to destroy the beet-sugar industry. I commend to them their own editorials as the best evidence of the motives of the trust in this fight and the methods it is employing to win it. Perhaps the best and most unbiased statement of the nature of that attempt to ruin those engaged in the production of beet sugar in the Missouri Valley was published in the New York Journal of Commerce, October 3, 1901, which is as follows:

President H. O. Havemeyer, of the sugar trust, was at his office on Tuesday, for the first time since his illness, and it was learned yesterday that one of his first official acts was to authorize one of the most spectacular reductions in refined sugar prices that have ever been made. The reduction is a blow aimed directly at the beet-sugar interests of the country. It applies only to such sections of the country in which beet sugar competes and is so important that it means that most of the beet factories will be compelled to market their product at a loss if they live up to the contracts they have recently made.

EXTENT OF THE CUT IN PRICES.

The cut in price to Missouri River points was to 3½ cents per pound net for granulated. On Tuesday the net quotation was 5.03 cents net. In other words, Mr. Havemeyer has authorized a cut slightly in excess of 1½ cents per pound.

To understand the importance of this cut to beet-sugar manufacturers it must be mentioned that the practice of the beet people is to make contracts for their entire production at prices based on the selling price of the sugar trust on the date of delivery. The beet people have heretofore been easily able to dispose of all their sugar at a discount of 10 points from the trust's figures. This means, if the beet people do not repudiate their contracts, that they will receive but 3⅜ cents per pound for their product. It is understood, however, that the beet-sugar people will refuse to recognize the cut made by the trust on the technical ground that it is ruinous and in restraint of trade. The beet-sugar refiners of Utah, Colorado, California, and Nebraska are the refiners concerned. The American Sugar Refining Company usually supplies sugar for the Missouri River points from its New Orleans and Pacific coast refineries. They now have, however, at least 20,000 barrels of granulated sugar held on consignment at Kansas City and nearby points shipped from New York during the latter part of July and first half of August. It is expected that this cut will have an unsettling influence upon the local market, but it is not expected that it will be followed by an important cut in prices in the Eastern market.

NO CHANGE IN EASTERN PRICES.

No change was made in the sugar trust's prices for Eastern markets yesterday, and the difference of 1.1 cents per pound still holds between the price of the raw and the manufactured article. (New York Journal of Commerce, October 3.)

But this attempt on the part of the sugar trust to destroy its only dangerous rival failed. The beginning, extent, and the cause of its war and failure is so clearly stated in the hearings (pp. 426 and 427 of the testimony) by Mr. Francis K. Carey, president National Sugar Manufacturing Company, of Sugar City, Colo., that I will quote from his testimony:

I now come to the war upon the Colorado factories made by the trust last fall.

When the sugar war broke out in California last summer Mr. Havemeyer made this utterance (I quote from the New York Sun of July 23):

"And there is one thing more I have noticed in the papers recently, that the sugar trust is back of and interested in the fight which Spreckels is making against Oxnard out in California. Our company has nothing whatever to do with that fight. The fight was brought about through the consumption of beet sugar not equaling the production. Oxnard wants to work off some of his superfluous product, and he thinks that if he can make it appear that he is fighting the trust he can get rid of some left-over beet sugar. Our company is not at all interested in that fight, but I know something about the fighting qualities of Spreckels, and I do not think Oxnard will win."

I remark, in passing, as I have already stated, that the trust has large interests with Mr. Spreckels in California; that Mr. Havemeyer's statement in regard to the consumption of beet sugar not equaling the production was absolutely untrue, and that the concluding sentence of the interview seems to me to have been unnecessarily brutal and malicious. However, I do not quote the article simply to call attention to those matters.

A very short time after making the statement which I have quoted the trust cut or pretended to cut the price of refined sugar in the Missouri Valley to 3½ cents a pound. The cut was made for the purpose of embarrassing the Colorado factories under their sugar contracts, which guaranteed the price against decline. Our factory had sold about 3,000,000 pounds of sugar at the then market price of $5.12 per 100 pounds, f. o. b. Kansas City, guaranteeing the price against decline; and other Colorado factories had sold much larger amounts on the same terms. The trust anticipated that its action in creating or pretending to create the 3½-cent market would force the delivery of our beet sugar under our contracts at $3.40 per 100 pounds, allowing the 10 points differential between cane and beet sugar. The only fact which saved the Colorado factories from destruction was that the trust could not then buy its raw sugar in New York at less than $3.75 per 100 pounds, so that after adding the refining cost and freight, an open market of $3.50 for refined sugar would have caused the trust a loss, which even its great resources could not stand. Our factory refused to recognize the cut, built an additional warehouse for the storage of its sugar, and offered to fill all its contracts by purchasing cane sugar, if it could be purchased; and the other Colorado factories taking the same position, the trust was forced to back down.

THE POLICY OF THE TRUST AS TOLD BY HAVEMEYER.

That this effort to destroy the only dangerous rival of the American sugar trust by a ruinous competition is in line with the policy of that great monopoly, and that the reason for that policy is the fact that refined sugar can be and is made directly from the beet without the intermediation of the sugar-refining trust is made clear and conclusive by the testimony of Mr. Havemeyer, president of that great organization, before the Industrial Commission. On page 132 of the testimony taken before that Commission (Preliminary Report, Public Document No. 476, part 1) we find the following by Mr. Havemeyer:

Q. Now, how can sugar be made in Germany from beets, or in the Philippines from cane, or in any other part of the world, cheaper than you can make it here? Is that owing to the labor, or what is it?

A. Because, in the evolution of sugar refining, refined sugar can be made directly from the beet without the intermediation of the sugar refinery.

Q. Then it is not the cane sugar abroad that you fear coming in, but the beet?

A. Both.

As to the attitude of Mr. Havemeyer and his sugar trust toward all competitors, Mr. Havemeyer, on page 108, testified as follows:

Q. If you can make it unprofitable to them (other refiners), they will stop their sales and in the long run the expectation is that the profit will be larger to your stockholders?

A. That would be the natural inference. Of course it goes without saying, if we protect our own meltings, it can only be done under the condition of things that makes it unprofitable for our competitors, the real motive being the protection of our own business, and the result being an absence of profit to them.

And again, on page 120, speaking of the policy of the sugar trust to crush out all competition, Mr. Havemeyer said:

Q. Now, I also understood you to imply at least that it is the policy of the American Sugar Refining Company to crush out all competition, if possible?

A. But that is not so; there is no such testimony. I understand it has been put in that form by one of the gentlemen, but it is not the fact. What I said was that it was the policy of the American Company to maintain and protect its trade, and if it resulted in crushing a competitor it is no concern of the American Company. If he gets in the press, that is his affair, not ours.

Q. And if anyone interferes with the business, profits, or competition of the American Sugar Refining Company it is its policy to prevent it, if possible?

A. By lowering profits to defy it.

Q. And if it results in crushing him out——
A. (Interrupting.) That is his affair.
Q. Not the affair of the American Sugar Refining Company?
A. No.

And on the question of controlling the price of refined sugar, on page 125 of the testimony before the Industrial Commission, Mr. Havemeyer again said:

Q. When you sell in this country, you control the price?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And it (the trust) was organized, as I understand it, with a view of controlling the price and output to the people of this country?
A. That was one of the objects of consolidation.
Q. And you have succeeded in doing it?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. That was the principal object in organizing the American Sugar Refining Company?
A. It may be said that was the principal object.

As to the proportion of the total amount of raw sugar refined by the trust, on page 107, Mr. Havemeyer said:

Q. What proportion does your output form of the total output of the country now?
A. I have never been able to get at those figures, but I should say about 90 per cent.
Q. You think about 90 per cent of America?
A. That is not of the capacity, but of the output. The fact is, that these refineries are not working full.
Q. Does the American Sugar-Refining Company itself have a capacity enough to supply the total demand, if it were not for the opposition? Your company could easily supply the total demand at the present capacity?
A. The demand and 20 per cent in excess.

To show his utter contempt for the interest of the public in the reduction of the price of refined sugar, on pages 112 and 117 of the testimony taken before the Industrial Commission Mr. Havemeyer stated as follows:

We maintain that when we reduced the cost we were entitled to the profit, and that it was none of the public's business.
Q. I say he (the consumer) may be benefited temporarily for six months or a year; but if, after the crushing out has taken place, you then, as you said in your testimony, resume a magin of profit which you consider is the right thing, and that is the only thing you were governed by, I ask you then whether the consumer will be materially benefited or not?
A. Is he not benefited to the extent of the reduction of the price during the fight?
Q. He is; but if he has to pay double or three times the price after the fight is ended I fail to see where he is benefited.
A. He is not if he has to pay that.
Q. I understood you to say when the war was ended you evened up?
A. Yes.
Q. The price you put on was for the benefit of the stockholder?
A. Yes.
Q. Do you think it is fair that the consumer should pay a dividend to your company on brands, good will, etc.?
A. I think it is fair to get out of the consumer all you can consistent with the business proposition.
Q. You state that as an ethical proposition before this Commission, and you have to stand on that ethical position for fair play. Now, I want to know if you think—you stated that the consumer received the benefits of this consolidation of industry—it a fair ethical position, independent of the business view you put on it, that the consumer should pay dividends on this $25,000,000 of overcapitalization?
A. I do not care two cents for your ethics. I do not know enough of them to apply them.

From this testimony of Mr. Havemeyer we see that the American sugar-refining interest, 90 per cent of which is controlled by the trust, realizes that the greatest danger to its future is the growth and development of the American sugar-producing industry; that it is hostile to any policy on the part of the Government that tends to encourage domestic production; that this would result in a large diminution of the enormous profits of the American sugar refiner; that to prevent this the American Sugar Refining Company, commonly called the "trust," is to-day pursuing a policy intended to crush out all competition. It is true Mr. Havemeyer denies this charge, but his denial is purely technical, because he said before the Industrial Commission that it was their policy "to maintain and protect its trade, and if it resulted in crushing a competitor it is no concern of the American company. If he gets in the press, that is his affair, not ours."

Q. If anyone interferes with the business, profits, competition, or affairs of the American Sugar Refining Company it is its policy to prevent it if possible?
A. By lowering profits to defy it.
Q. If it results in crushing him out——
A. (Interrupting.) That is his affair.

If the American sugar-refining trust can ever succeed in destroying the domestic sugar-producing industry, then the American people will realize in a practical way the real purpose and effect of this warfare now carried on by that monopoly against our domestic industry. Mr. Havemeyer, in his testimony above quoted, has been kind enough to tell us why it is that his company adopted this policy of extermination, and what benefit it would derive if this was successfully accomplished, for he said before the Industrial Commission:

Q. When you sell in this country you control the price?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And it (the trust) is organized with a view of controlling the price and output to the people of this country?
A. That was one of the objects of consolidation.
Q. You have succeeded in doing it?
A. Yes, sir.

THE PROFITS OF THE TRUST.

That the country may know to what extent under existing conditions and with the competition which the sugar-refining trust has on account of the domestic beet-sugar industry refining its own product, I want to call attention to the admissions of the sugar refiners themselves before the Ways and Means Committee as to the profits they are now making in the business of refining raw sugars imported from foreign countries. They told us that they allowed from 1 to 1¼ cents a pound for cost of refining, commissions on sales, cost of distribution, and all other expenses incident to the business of refining and placing the product in the hands of the wholesaler or retailer; that their net profit was at least one-half a cent a pound.

Last year there was refined in the United States, exclusive of Hawaii, 4,113,023,040 pounds, and of this amount Mr. Havemeyer, before the Industrial Commission, testified that they—the trust—refined 90 per cent, so that the net profit on the sugar refined last year by the American Sugar Refining Company, exclusive of the sugar refined which came from Hawaii, was almost $20,000,000. And on page 111 of the testimony before the Industrial Commission Mr. Havemeyer states that his refineries could be built new at a cost of from $30,000,000 to $35,000,000.

PRODUCTION OF BEET SUGAR OUR ONLY PROTECTION.

The only protection, then, that the American people have against the unreasonable exactions of this monopoly in the business of manufacturing refined sugar is to continue to encourage the growth and development of the beet-sugar industry, thereby preventing the trust from obtaining absolute and complete control over the market of this country for the sale of refined sugar. That this will be accomplished if we continue the present policy of encouraging the growth and development of our domestic sugar industry is amply proven by the tremendous strides which that industry has made since the enactment of the present Dingley law imposing a protective duty upon sugar.

THE GROWTH OF THE INDUSTRY UNDER PRESENT LAW.

Under no law ever enacted by Congress, except the law imposing a duty upon tin plate, has any infant industry prospered and developed as has the domestic beet-sugar industry since the enactment of the Dingley law.

AMERICAN BEET-SUGAR FACTORIES AND THE TARIFF LAWS UNDER WHICH THEY WERE ERECTED.

The following list comprises all the beet-sugar factories in the United States, date of erection, daily capacity in tons of beets, and cost to construct and equip. Cost based on $1,097 per ton of daily capacity, as per United States Census Bulletin No. 59.

All arrangements had been perfected to erect eight factories in 1902, and some of them are known to be under construction. Whether or not any of them have been abandoned for this season, pending the outcome of Cuban tariff reductions, has not been ascertained.

TARIFF PROVISIONS ON SUGAR.

(1) Sugars not above No. 16 Dutch standard in color and upon all sugars which have gone through a process of refining, one-half of 1 cent per pound; bounty, 1½ and 2 cents per pound on home production.

(2) Sugars not above No. 16 Dutch standard in color, 40 per cent ad valorem; above No. 16 Dutch standard in color and upon all sugars which have gone through a process of refining, 40 per cent and one-eighth of 1 cent per pound.

(3) Sugars not above No. 16 Dutch standard in color and not above 75° polariscope test, 95 cents per 100 pounds; for each degree above 75, 3½ cents per pound additional.

Above No. 16 Dutch standard in color and upon all sugars which have gone through a process of refining, $1.95 per 100 pounds.

In view of this marvelous development of our domestic sugar industry under the existing law, it seems incredible that any representative of an American constituency—I care not what his politics—should propose the enactment of a law that would take away from that industry any part of that protection which is necessary to enable it to compete with a like industry in any foreign country, no matter how close may be the relation of that country to the United States.

I am aware that some gentlemen on this floor now claim that this proposed reduction of 20 per cent will not injure the sugar industry of this country. If it does not seriously injure the industry in so far as it is developed, that it will certainly destroy the further development of the industry can not be denied. There is abundant testimony on this point and I have already referred to projected factories that have been abandoned. Wendell Phillips once said "there is nothing so timid as a million dollars except two million." And this timidity on the part of capital, in view of the powerful influence that has secured this 20 per cent reduction, will increase and will prevent the investment of capital in the further development of the industry through the fear that the reduction which Mr. Havemeyer and the Americans interested in Cuba want, namely, free sugar from Cuba, will ultimately be secured.

When this question of the effect of a 20 per cent reduction or any reduction of the duty on sugar upon the domestic industry was before the Ways and Means Committee, several of the members asked questions bearing upon this point, and quite an altercation between Mr. HOPKINS, Mr. DALZELL, Mr. GROSVENOR, and others occurred. So animated did this discussion become, and the intimation on the part of Mr. HOPKINS that a small reduction of the duty on sugar would not affect the domestic industry was so promptly and forcibly repelled by members who are now advocating this proposed reduction, that the chairman of the committee was even obliged to rap for order, as will appear from the following stenographic report of the proceedings at that time:

Mr. GROSVENOR. Allow me to ask you a question; and don't get me on the wrong side, either.

Mr. CAREY. I will assume that it comes from a friendly source this time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is it possible, in your judgment, to make a concession to Cuban sugar that will benefit the Cuban people and still not injure the production in the United States of cane and beet sugar?

Mr. CAREY. I do not think anything about it; I know that it is not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Nobody could help knowing that who knew enough to put two and two together.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is a pretty broad statement to make, but I would like to have figures on it.

Mr. CAREY. Well, if you will only give us an orderly opportunity to produce our figures, we will only be too happy to give them to you. How, Mr. Chairman, do you suppose, does this committee expect to get at facts? Do you expect to get at facts which have scientific bearings, which have agricultural bearings, which have intricate business bearings in a town meeting?

Mr. DALZELL. We have fifty pages of facts in the record which we have been making for the past few weeks.

Mr. HOPKINS. They claim that any reduction on the tariff rate on sugar is going to be an injury to them.

Mr. DALZELL. A dozen witnesses have testified to that.

(The chairman rapped for order.)

The CHAIRMAN. This discussion is not in order. If any gentleman of the committee wishes to ask Mr. Carey questions, we will listen to the questions; but the discussion will come afterwards.

This only shows that at that time, and based on the testimony, the judgment of the very men who are now the leading advocates of this proposed reduction was that any reduction whatever of the duty on sugar would be injurious to our domestic industry.

THE PLEDGE OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

That duty was placed upon the product of this industry in accordance with the express pledge made to the people of the United States by the Republican party in its platform adopted at St. Louis in 1896. That pledge is as follows:

We condemn the present Administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country. The Republican party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use, and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

Pass this bill and you will merit the same condemnation we invoked upon our opponents for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country.

The confidence of the people in the Republican party maintaining while in power the law which we ourselves enacted for the protection and development of the sugar industry caused them to invest their capital in that industry. Let us not, therefore, betray that confidence by now repealing or modifying that provision of the existing law under which we have witnessed this marvelous growth and development of an important industry. To do so would be an act of bad faith on our part. It would discredit, more than anything else we could do, the party we represent upon this floor. As said by Mr. Farquhar:

I do not believe that nations, any more than individuals, can safely violate the rules of honesty and fair dealing.

THE POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT TOWARD THIS INDUSTRY.

The relation of the United States to the beet-sugar industry is different from that maintained toward any other industry in the country. Congress has not confined itself merely to the enactment of a protective tariff for the growth and development of that industry, but has done an immense amount of missionary work to induce capital to invest in the business and induce farmers to abandon other crops and devote themselves to the cultivation of sugar beets. We have sent our agents to public meetings in various sections of the country; we have issued a vast amount of literature in the shape of annual reports to Congress; we have circulated these reports among the people, instructing them how to grow sugar beets that will produce the highest possible degree of saccharine matter.

In many other ways has the Government exercised its power and influence to induce American citizens with their capital to unite in furnishing to the farmers a new and profitable industry, in the hope, which hope is rapidly being realized, that in a few years, instead of sending to the people of foreign countries more than $125,000,000 annually for the sugar we consume, we will be producing that sugar ourselves and distributing that money among our own people. [Applause.]

SUGAR-TRUST PRINCIPAL BENEFICIARY.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another important consideration in connection with this proposed legislation, one which to my mind, independent of the effect it may have upon any domestic industry, should prevent the passage of this bill. It is the fact, established by an overwhelming array of testimony, testimony that is absolutely conclusive, that Cuba will derive very little, if any, benefit from the proposed reduction of the duty on sugar.

A great deal has been said in this debate to prove that the sugar trust will not and can not absorb any of the proposed reduction of duty on raw sugar coming from Cuba. The best indication of the fact of whether or not this legislation will be beneficial to the sugar trust is the effect which our action here tending to promote the passage of the bill under consideration has had upon the market price of the stock of that organization. The reports made every day to the country as to the rise and fall of any stock upon the market is the barometer which shows the future prospects of the company owning such stock. These reports are written in cold blood; they are nonpolitical; they contain nothing but actual transactions and the facts that induced them. From these reports we see that from the first week in January, when we decided to take up this question, to the 21st of March, the increase in the valuation of the common and preferred stock of the American Sugar Trust was $9,675,000. Stockbrokers are never influenced in their business by sentiment. They are in close touch with all the influences bearing upon the prospective rise or fall in stocks.

On the 7th and 15th of February the Haight & Freese Company, stockbrokers, of New York, with offices in all the leading cities of the United States, advised their customers concerning the prospective rise in sugar stock and the reason therefor, as follows:

THE SUGAR PROBLEM.

FEBRUARY 7, 1902.

DEAR SIR: Reports from Washington favor the passage of the bill to reduce the import duty on sugar for the benefit of Cuba. The Administration is favorably committed to the measure. If the bill passes the stock will have a tremendous rise. Speculators would buy it freely around 160, as they have always done before each time the stock sells around such figures.

The primary beneficiary from the passage of such a bill at Washington would be the American Sugar Refineries Company, inasmuch as they would be in possession of the sugar instead of the planter.

We believe before summer comes again sugar will sell near 160.

THE COMING SUGAR STRUGGLE AT WASHINGTON.

FEBRUARY 15, 1902.

DEAR SIR: All eyes interested in sugar are centered on Washington for first indications as to what will be done relative to duties, the subject coming up in the interest of Cuba. Sugar is one of Cuba's greatest products, and the American duty thereon will have the greatest importance and bearing upon many interests, notably the American Sugar Refining Company. The question is, Will the United States reduce the present duty 25 per cent, or thereabouts, on sugar coming from Cuba, or will it let matters rest as they are? Opposed to the action is the beet-sugar interest; in favor of it are the * * * President and the interests of the American Sugar Refining Company.

If the measure goes through Congress and becomes operative, the stock of the American Sugar Refining Company will have a tremendous rise and easily gross 150; if it fails the stock would undoubtedly suffer quite an extensive decline. If the reduction becomes a law, the primary beneficiary would be the American Sugar Company, inasmuch as they would be in possession of the raw sugar instead of the planter.

This shows who the real beneficiaries of your action will be if this bill ever becomes a law. Oh, but gentlemen will say, this prediction was made for the purpose of fleecing the innocent lambs of the country, but the facts are otherwise.

That these predictions were well founded is shown conclusively by the effect upon the price of that stock of the action of the Republican members of this House in their last conference, when it was decided by a majority of the conference, but by a minority of the Republican membership of the House, to instruct the Ways and Means Committee to report favorably the pending bill.

On March 19, the day following this conference, under the heading "Finance and trade," appeared the daily dispatch from New York in the Evening Star of this city, giving an account of the market and sale of the various stocks, including sugar stock. On that day this stock opened at 129 per share and sold as high as 130⅜, closing at 130.

The following paragraph contained in the above dispatch shows the reason for this increase in the price of this stock:

Sugar was taken in hand at one time and forced up to 130⅜, but the new high prices brought out profit-taking sales on a considerable scale. The defeat of the beet-sugar men in Washington may be made more of at a later date when the legislation is completed and the trade begins to appreciate the strength of the American company's (trust's) position.

The following day, in the same paper, appeared the daily dispatch from New York giving the stock quotations, from which it appears that sugar stock closed at 131 and sold as high as 131½. In the dispatch appears the following explanation of this fact:

Sugar was taken in hand by the inside faction and made to sell up in the thirties under big dealings. The attempt to belittle the effect of the Cuban legislation as now proposed has not discouraged the friends of the property, who had determined upon higher prices at this time.

On the following day, in the same dispatch, published in the same paper, the fact appears that sugar sold at 134 and closed at 133⅝, an increase of almost 4 points over the previous day. And in the body of the dispatch the following explanation of the increase is given:

Sugar was marked up under big dealings, credited to lower Wall street, and based upon earnings and the expected benefits from Cuban legislation.

Following the action of the Committee on Ways and Means reporting this bill favorably, in the same paper and in the same New York dispatch giving stock quotations, it appears that the stock advanced 2 points, and such advance was attributed to the action of that committee in reporting favorably the proposition to reduce the duty on raw sugar coming from Cuba.

These facts are infinitely more conclusive upon the question of who will be the beneficiary of this legislation than all the fine-spun theories and all of the figures presented to the House a few days ago by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LONG] and by other members who seek to make the country believe that this proposed reduction will go to the benefit of the people of Cuba.

When before the committee, Colonel Bliss, the customs collector at the port of Habana, testified, when asked concerning whether or not the benefit of this reduction would go to Cuba, that, in his judgment, not to exceed 30 per cent of it would ever reach Cuba. The remaining 70 per cent would, therefore, be absorbed by the sugar trust, that buys practically all of Cuba's sugar.

ONE MARKET AND ONE BUYER FOR CUBAN SUGAR.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another fact which shows that the trust will be the chief beneficiary of a reduction of the duty on sugar. There are only two open markets of the world for the sale of Cuban sugar—England and the United States. All others are closed by prohibitive duties for the benefit of domestic producers. In both of these markets Cuban sugar is sold at the world's price—a price fixed each day at London f. o. b. Hamburg. In the American market there is only one buyer—the sugar trust. Hence there is no competition in this market, and the Cuban planter is obliged to sell at the world's price or store his sugar at great expense and loss from deterioration, resulting from humidity and discoloration, or he ships his sugar to England—his only other market.

But this last alternative involves increased freight charges, increased risk, and consequent increased insurance, which he will save if he sells to the trust. He is therefore at the mercy of the trust, and must therefore accept the world's price. Hence, the trust buys this sugar and imports into this country by paying 20 per cent less duty than it would have to pay on its raw sugar imported from Germany or any other country, and thereby it would absorb all of this proposed reduction and become the chief beneficiary of your action. These are conditions well understood by stockbrokers and by the sugar refining company. It is this that has prompted the broker to encourage people to buy sugar stock, and it is one of the reasons why the trust has been doing its utmost to secure this reduction of duty on raw sugar coming from Cuba.

AMERICAN INTERESTS IN CUBA.

But, Mr. Chairman, if the sugar trust does not absorb this reduction it will nevertheless not go to Cuba, because we are told by the other side that at least two-thirds of the sugar crop in Cuba is produced by nonresident planters and corporations chartered and domiciled in the United States. In one of the early conferences on this proposition I submitted a proposition to refund 20 per cent of the duties collected on the products of Cuba to the government of Cuba, and that the government of the island was to pay to the actual bona fide cane grower of the island a sum equivalent to 20 per cent of the duty we had collected upon the sugar produced from the cane grown by him. To this proposition the other side replied as follows:

Many of the largest cane plantations in Cuba are owned by individuals who are nonresidents of the island, many of whom have owned their properties for twenty or more years. These persons can get none of Mr. TAWNEY'S bounty. Other large plantations are owned by corporations chartered under the laws of this and other countries. These corporations can not be bona fide residents of Cuba, even though some of their stockholders may be; hence these corporations could not share in Mr. TAWNEY'S bounty. Yet these two classes, nonresident owners and corporations, produce fully two-thirds of Cuba's cane.

If two-thirds of Cuba's cane is produced by nonresidents, including American corporations, then certainly not to exceed one-third of the reduction of the duty would inure to the benefit of Cuba. Certainly we are under no greater obligations to these nonresident planters and American corporations whose interests are in a foreign country than we owe to our own people and to American capital invested in the development of American industries.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we are asked to adopt what? We are asked to adopt the policy of encouraging American capital to go into a foreign country for the purpose of exploiting that country, developing its resources with half-civilized labor, that the product of that labor may be brought into the United States in competition with American free labor and disposed of under special tariff privileges and advantages.

Mr. Chairman, that policy would not only be unrepublican and undemocratic, but it would be, it is, un-American. No political party has adopted the policy of encouraging American capital to invest in a foreign country in any way, and especially not by permitting the product of the cheap labor of that country to be brought here and sold under a protective tariff in competition with the producers of American products, and this is the first time in the history of the United States it was ever attempted. I not only hope it will never be attempted again, but that this attempt will be an ignominious failure.

We all know that a vast amount of American capital has gone to the island of Cuba since the war. I remember during the hearings that Mr. METCALF, the gentleman from California, a member of the committee, read the following dispatch from the American Club, of Habana, Cuba, and other witnesses testified as to the extent of American holdings in the island:

Mr. METCALF. I hold in my hand a communication, addressed to me, coming from the Merchants' Association of New York, whose office is in the

New York Life Building. It is dated New York, January 24, 1902, and is as follows:

"We incorporate herein the following cable message received this morning from the president of the American Club, of Habana, Cuba:

"HABANA, January 23, 1902.

"President Merchants' Association, New York:

"American interests in Cuba, aggregating about $80,000,000, urge your body to immediately exert every effort possible, through every channel of influence at your command, to have Congress grant tariff concessions asked for by Cuban commission in order to save their interests from financial ruin. Every commercial interest in Cuba is jeopardized unless immediate favorable action is taken."

Mr. POST. I represent the controlling interest in the National Sugar Refining Company. It is a matter of record, of course.

Mr. METCALF. I would like to come back to a question. Can you give me the names of any of your stockholders who are interested in sugar lands?

Mr. POST. Yes; Mr. Tooker, Mr. Bunker, Mr. Mollenhauer, Mr. Howell, and various men who are stockholders in the National are interested in sugar lands and have been for some years.

Mr. METCALF. Have they been purchasing lands there recently?

Mr. POST. Three years ago.

Mr. METCALF. Do you know the amounts of their holdings?

Mr. POST. I do not know what each individual holding is. They are interested in three estates in Cuba. One has 66,000 acres, and of that about 10,000 acres are under cultivation. The next one has 7,000 acres, and about 5,000 acres are in cane. The third has about 3,500 acres, and about 1,500 of them are in cane.

Mr. METCALF. Do you know whether Mr. Havemeyer owns any cane-sugar lands in Cuba?

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Havemeyer, as an individual, has some interests, which are very moderate interests, in Cuba.

Mr. METCALF. Do you know to what extent?

Mr. ATKINS. I would like to be excused from stating specifically what I know. Mr. Havemeyer is interested with me in the corporation down there. Just what his interest is I beg to be excused from stating, but I can assure you that it is a very moderate interest and not sufficient to exercise control over that one property.

Mr. METCALF. What is the name of the corporation, Mr. Atkins?

Mr. ATKINS. That particular corporation is the Trinidad Sugar Company.

Mr. METCALF. Is he interested with you in any other corporation?

Mr. ATKINS. No. I beg your pardon—he is not—except that I have an investment interest in the refining company.

Mr. METCALF. I understand. Do any of the stockholders of the American Sugar Refining Company—is that the name of the corporation?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes.

Mr. METCALF. Do any of the stockholders of that refinery, other than yourself, own sugar-cane lands in Cuba?

Mr. ATKINS. I know of one or two who have some interests there, simply as investment interests, but they have nothing whatever to do with the refining interests.

Mr. METCALF. Can you furnish their names?

Mr. ATKINS. I would prefer not to do that, because I should consider it a breach of confidence.

Mr. METCALF. Very well. Do any of the directors, to your knowledge, own such lands?

Mr. ATKINS. I would like to assure you that, so far as I know, their interests are extremely moderate and exercise no control whatever.

Mr. METCALF. Do any of the directors of the American Sugar Refining Company, to your knowledge, own any sugar-cane lands in Cuba?

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Havemeyer is a director of the company.

Mr. METCALF. I say, do any of the other directors?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes; that is the question I supposed I was answering.

Mr. METCALF. I was asking you before about stockholders.

Mr. ATKINS. About stockholders?

Mr. METCALF. Yes.

Mr. ATKINS. I covered, in my answer, both stockholders and directors. I know of two or three instances where people interested in the American Sugar Refining Company are also interested in various business enterprises in the island of Cuba; but in every case, so far as my knowledge extends, those interests are not controlling interests. They are simply investment interests, and they take no part in the management of the corporations.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, leaving out that class.

Mr. ATKINS. Well, I can name them on my fingers. Mr. Kelley, who is here, represents an estate, of which he is a part owner, on the south side of Cuba which turns out from 10,000 to 12,000 tons of sugar per year.

Mr. ROBERTSON. What grade of sugar is that?

Mr. ATKINS. That is standard 69 centrifugal sugar. The Trinidad Sugar Company, of which I am president, at Trinidad, Cuba, has an estate the capacity of which is about 10,000 tons per annum. My own property at Cienfuegos has a capacity of about 12,000 tons of sugar. We turned out last year 11,000 tons. The Homiguiero estate is held by a New York corporation, located at Cienfuegos, Cuba, and has a capacity of 12,000 tons. The Constancia estate, recently purchased by parties in Louisiana, represented by Mr. Spellman, connected with the Illinois Central Railroad, I should say should have a capacity of about 20,000 tons of sugar.

The United Fruit Company, of Boston, at a place called Banes, have a factory—a new factory, started last year—with a capacity of about 20,000 tons. There is the property called the "Chaparra Sugar Company," at Puerto Padre, on the north coast of Cuba, which is about ready to start up, owned by New York gentlemen, in which ex-Representative Hawley, of Texas, is interested, and which has a capacity of about 30,000 tons. This estate has never been operated. There is an estate near Santiago, called the "San Francisco," in which Mr. Craig, of Philadelphia, is interested, which will start, I believe, this year with a capacity, I believe, of 15,000 tons of sugar. Now, as far as my memory serves me correctly, I think that is all the bona fide American interests there.

This stockholder of the American Sugar Refining trust asked to be excused from stating specifically what amount the president of that company had invested in the sugar lands of the island of Cuba.

Señor T. Estrada Palma's interview, as he was leaving last week for Cuba:

"I look for very large reductions in the tariff, and when that is secured Cuba can rise. Her people are grateful and happy, and they are willing to work to improve their condition. Last year, without outside help, they made 800,000 tons of sugar, and they will make vastly more next year.

"The wealth of Cuba is in her soil. She can grow vast quantities of the finest fruits and vegetables, and she is rich in minerals, particularly in iron, copper, and manganese. Some of the finest iron ore mined comes from Cuba, and nearly all of the steel used in the construction of the United States ships of war was brought to this country from my country."

"On what do you base the hope that the United States Congress will reduce the tariff duties," General Palma was asked.

"On justice, and also because vast sums of American money are being invested in Cuba," he replied. "The influence back of that American wealth will be exerted to that end. Practically all of the railroads in Cuba are owned at present by American and British capitalists. Those railroads can not get freight rates from the sugar and tobacco planters if a restrictive duty is on their products."

Here is the secret of the agitation that has been going on in this country for concessions to Cuba. To adopt this policy at the instance of American capitalists would be un-American. It is not our policy to encourage the investment of American home capital in foreign countries, but to encourage its investment at home.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where was that testimony taken?

Mr. TAWNEY. Before the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Was it taken under oath?

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you excuse witnesses in that way?

Mr. TAWNEY. The witnesses were excused in this instance.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman one question: How much sugar have the American millionaires gone down and bought in Cuba, does the gentleman know?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will give you what Mr. Atkins said:

Mr. ATKINS. That is standard 69 centrifugal sugar. The Trinidad Sugar Company, of which I am president, at Trinidad, Cuba, has an estate the capacity of which is about 10,000 tons per annum. My own property at Cienfuegos has a capacity of about 12,000 tons of sugar. We turned out last year 11,000 tons. The Homiguiero estate is held by a New York corporation, located at Cienfuegos, Cuba, and has a capacity of 12,000 tons, etc.

Mr. Hawley told us that the plantation he was interested in consisted of more than 77,000 acres.

Mr. Atkins, who absolutely refused to give information, was finally forced to admit that there were many large American holdings in Cuba. The aggregate production of all the plantations, he told us, controlled by American corporations will this year amount to over 135,000 tons of sugar.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does Mr. Hawley want this reduction?

Mr. TAWNEY. He was before our committee and urged it very strenuously. His testimony will be found in the published hearings before the committee.

THE EVILS OF THIS POLICY POINTED OUT BY PROFESSOR GUNTON.

Mr. Chairman, in this connection I want to call attention to what I consider one of the ablest statements of the effect of our adopting the policy of encouraging American capital to invest in foreign lands, and the most severe criticism upon it I have seen anywhere. It was published in the March number of Gunton's Magazine, written by the editor of that periodical, Mr. Gunton:

In reply to a question of Chairman PAYNE, Mr. Atkins told the committee that "a very large percentage of the Cuban sugar industry was owned by citizens of the United States." These were the interests for which Mr. Atkins pleaded for free sugar. Now, on what grounds of public policy should the United States protect American investors in foreign countries? Nothing could be more against a sound American policy.

If the protective tariff is of any value whatever to the nation, it is to encourage capital to invest in the development of industry in the United States, not to encourage capital to invest in foreign countries and bring the products to this country in competition with our domestic products. This is exactly what should be prevented. If there is any application of the tariff which should make this impossible, it should be made to the fullest extent. How charming to encourage a state of affairs in which American capitalists, sugar refiners, and what not, could go to Cuba or any other foreign country and use the equivalent of slave labor and be exempt from duty in the United States against competition of other civilized countries. This would be using the tariff to drive capital away from the United States, and encourage the use of the lowest and cheapest labor in the world in preference to employing American labor or the use of the most modern methods in Christendom.

Mr. Atkins ought to be nonsuited on his own presentation of the case. He represents the downward movement of industry. He would give systematic aid to capital in deserting the United States for semicivilized countries and give employment to the lowest and cheapest labor in the world in preference to American labor. Economically nothing could be more scandalous. There is good ground for extending sympathy, and even some economic aid, to Cuba, but there is absolutely none for helping the cheap-labor, pinchbeck policy of Mr. Atkins and the American refiners. That would simply be offering capital a money premium from the United States Treasury to desert American industry and employ the semislave labor of half-civilized countries to supply the American market.

Such a policy would convert the tariff into a deadly weapon for the destruction of American industry and the depression of American labor. If these capitalists want protection or special privileges in the sugar market from the United States, they must invest their capital and conduct the industry in this country, employ American labor, and pay American wages. When American capital goes to a foreign country in pursuit of cheap labor, it loses all claim to protection or privilege in the American market. Protection is not for capital per se, but for American industry. It is for capital and labor employed in the development of industry in this country, but not for any other capital or labor employed in any other country.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What does the gentleman mean by "slave labor" down there?

Mr. TAWNEY. I did not refer to slave labor myself.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But what does that writer mean by the term?

Mr. TAWNEY. I suppose what Mr. Gunton meant by the term "semislave labor" was to describe the condition of labor in Cuba, which is practically that of half-civilized labor. The people there can clothe themselves with fig leaves and live on bananas; and it is the product of that kind of labor that it is proposed to bring into the United States to be sold in competition with our labor under special tariff privileges and advantages, and all for the benefit of American capital invested in Cuba.

FIRST TIME REPUBLICANS HAVE ABANDONED PROTECTION.

Mr. Chairman, this is the first time in the history of the Republican party that leading Republicans have proposed to depart from the policy of protection by taking away from an American industry, yet in the infancy of its development but capable of rivaling any of our giant industries, the protection given to it less than five years ago by ourselves. There is no argument that can be made in favor of it or with respect to the sufficiency of the reduced duty to fully develop this industry that does not apply with infinitely greater force to all other industries.

Under the logic of the advocates of this proposed reduction and in order to be consistent we should likewise reduce duties now imposed on articles manufactured or produced by all other industries. In other words, if we propose to heed the blatant plea of the free-trade press with respect to the duty upon raw sugar, then we should likewise heed that plea and adopt a similar policy with respect to the products of other industries, and thus admit that the policy of our party, as claimed by the free trader, is no longer necessary to encourage any American industry or to protect American labor.

NO REPUBLICAN DEFENDS THIS PROPOSITION.

No Republican can logically defend a proposition which takes away from an industry now struggling through the dangerous period of infancy any portion of the protection necessary to its full development and at the same time ignore a sentiment throughout the country demanding a reduction of the duty on articles produced by fully developed industries. There is no industrial or financial distress, either real or imaginary, in any country foreign to our own, I care not how close the relation of that country to the United States, that would justify such action.

While I deny that it can be sustained upon the ground that it is demanded by national honor, yet, even if that were true, our Government, under the control of the Republican party, is also bound in honor to keep faith first with its own people. If this is a debt of honor due to the people of Cuba from the people of the United States, as claimed, then the nation should pay it, and not the farmers engaged in the production of sugar and tobacco. If it is a national obligation, it rests upon all and should be borne by all. Nor should any class of our people or any section of our country seek to impose upon another class or upon another section the burden of discharging an obligation that rests upon the whole country. Nor should the people of one section seek to extend their trade in the market of Cuba or in the market of any other foreign country at the expense of the producers in any other section.

But is it possible for an executive or administrative officer, by an unauthorized promise to a foreign people, to bind the Government to the extent of compelling it to violate obligations of honor and good faith to its own people? This is what must be done if such unauthorized promise has been made in this case and must be kept, for in doing so we violate the pledge made in 1896 by the party now in control of the Government, on the faith of which the people have embarked in the development of the sugar industry. If that is so, then the representatives of the people, chosen by the people to legislate for the people, have been superseded by the administrative departments of the Government, and such departments, not the people, are now supreme.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the express promises of the Republican party in respect to the development of the sugar-producing industry, this bill involves far more than the welfare of Cuba or the extension of our trade in that market or the keeping of vague, indefinite, and unauthorized promises. It involves more than the future growth and development of our sugar industry. It involves the honor and good faith of the Republican party in its administration of governmental affairs affecting the material welfare of the people.

THE PRIDE OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

From the time of its birth it has been the pride of the Republican party that its pledges made to the people have been kept ever sacred and performed in good faith. To this more than to anything else it owes its almost uninterrupted control of the Government during the last half of the nineteenth century. Its leaders have never before deviated from that course far enough to receive the commendation or the votes of a majority of the Democrats on this floor, and they would not now receive that commendation if, as I believe, their convictions and the dictates of their own better judgment were followed instead of the mistaken ideas of expediency. [Applause.]

THE BENEFITS OF PROTECTION.

Mr. Chairman, the policy of no political party since the formation of our Government has contributed so much to the welfare of the people as has the Republican policy of protection. It has illumined the pathway of national progress. To it we owe our marvelous industrial development. It has not led to a mere concentration of welfare among a small class, but its benefits have extended to all, even from the lowest to the highest. While it is true that under it there has been immense accumulation of wealth, extraordinary investment in productive enterprise, remarkable development in economic devices, there has also been as unmistakable progress in the welfare, growth, and personal independence, and in the social and political power of the manual toilers of our country. Under that policy they have shared equally with all others the opportunity it has afforded for the betterment of the material well-being of the American people, and have so prospered that to-day, in intelligence, in independence of thought and action, as well as in material prosperity, their position is incomparably superior to that of the laboring classes of any other country on the planet. [Loud applause.]

To this system, therefore, as applied by the Dingley law, is due the marvelous rehabilitation, the last five years, of established industries and the unprecedented growth and development of new industries. This act was the Alladin's magic ring that wrought the mighty transformation we to-day witness in the marvelous prosperity of the American people. Therefore, whatever else we should do or might do with safety in respect to the reduction of tariff duties on the products of fully developed industries, let us not betray any feebleness of attachment to the beneficent principle of protection which has fed the stream of our exuberant national life by taking away from our sugar-producing industry—an agricultural industry—any of the protection we ourselves have given it. Whatever the influence demanding this, by whomsoever that influence may be exerted, as we love our country and our party and revere the memory of their past splendors and achievements, we must stand with unflinching firmness by that anchor of our hope, the Republican system of protection to American industry and labor, where the application of that system is essential to the full development of the one or the protection of the other. Then will we attain the fullest possible development of all our resources, secure the greatest happiness and prosperity to the people, and to the nation its highest destiny. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, in this, the closing hour of a somewhat protracted debate, it is my desire to occupy as little time as possible, having in view the importance of the questions to be discussed. I do not believe that anything I can say, or that anyone can say now, will influence a vote for or against the pending measure. Its fate has already been decided, irrespective of further debate.

Any intelligent consideration of the bill before the House involves an accurate knowledge of what it is as distinguished from what it is not. It is not, as has been erroneously argued, an attack upon protection. It does not contemplate any revision of the existing tariff law or of any of its schedules. It will not, as I think I shall be able to show, harm any American industry or deprive any American workman of a single day's wage.

If it were otherwise it would not receive my support, for I believe in and am an advocate of the American system inaugurated by Alexander Hamilton, the greatest of all American statesmen. I believe in a protective tariff system as the bulwark of our prosperity, the efficient means of securing to us our home market—the most magnificent of all markets—and of securing to us ultimately our share of the markets of the world.

That system finds its vindication in the splendid realities of to-day. We are riding on the top wave of prosperity. There is no cowardly hiding of capital. It is everywhere courageously invested. There is no man idle who wants to work, no excuse for poverty, no want that industry has not the opportunity to relieve. All our furnaces are in blast, all our factories running, all our mills noisy with the glad response of machinery in continuous motion. Wages are high—never so high before.

In a political policy that has produced such results I am a sincere believer, and any man who questions my loyalty to the protective system because of my attitude with respect to the pending measure does me an injustice. He looks at the question from a different standpoint from mine, and as I believe from a mistaken standpoint. I should regard any revision of the tariff in this time of unexampled and abounding prosperity as the very height of legislative madness.

What, then, is this bill? It is, in the first place, a plain business proposition for reciprocal trade arrangements between the United States and Cuba, and it is justifiable upon plain business principles. But it is more than that. It is a step toward the redemption of the pledge that we made not to Cuba, not to the Cuban people, but to ourselves when we declared war upon Spain. Indignant at her wrongs in Cuba for three hundred years, we voluntarily assumed to right them. The wreck of our splendid battle ship, the Maine, when on a friendly visit in Habana Harbor, and the sacrifice of our brave seamen exhausted all patience, evoked the irresistible indignation of the American people, and resulted in their determination to put an end to the domination of Spain in Cuba. We resolved upon war, but we resolved upon war with a purpose.

What was that purpose? When President McKinley asked of Congress authority to use the military and naval forces of the United States, he clearly defined and declared the purpose. It was "to secure a full and final termination of hostilities between the Government of Spain and the people of Cuba, and to secure in the island the establishment of a stable government, capable of maintaining order and observing its international obligations, insuring peace and tranquillity and the security of its citizens as well as our own."

That was the purpose for which we went to war. The acquisition of Porto Rico, the acquisition of the Philippine archipelago, the tremendous and unforeseen consequences that have followed upon the Spanish war obscure now to our vision what our original and only purpose was, namely, to secure a stable government in Cuba and to insure peace and tranquillity to her citizens. It was for that that we took up the gage of battle; it was for that that every step was taken in the war that followed upon our declaration; it was for that that Dewey sailed into Manila Bay; that Cervera's fleet was sunken off the coast of Cuba; that on San Juan hill and on the heights of Santiago our brave boys carried to victory the banner of the stars. [Applause.] We drove Spain out of Cuba.

But the driving of Spain out of Cuba was not a redemption of our pledge nor a fulfillment of our self-assumed task, for until there shall be a stable government in that island, until peace and tranquillity shall be insured to its inhabitants, the mission, the purpose we had in view when we took up our arms in the cause of humanity, will still remain unfulfilled. As Mr. McKinley has well said:

> We have by reason of having driven Spain out of Cuba become the guarantors of Cuban independence and the guarantors of a stable government in that island, protecting property and life.

It was in conformity with our original purpose that we insisted that the Platt amendment should become part of the Cuban constitution, and as a matter of history it can be said beyond all reasonable doubt or question that it was accepted by the Cubans with the plain understanding upon their part that at some future time we would enter into reciprocal trade relations with them. The acceptance of the Platt amendment established new and closer and more intimate relations between Cuba and ourselves

By that amendment Cuba formally recognized the Monroe doctrine; by that amendment Cuba agreed to live within her income; agreed that we should have the right to intervene for the preservation of her independence; that all American rights accruing during the military occupation should be respected; that for her protection and our own proper sanitation should be provided; that for the preservation of her independence and for our defense we should have proper coaling and naval stations on the island. How, I ask you, can Cuba live within her means if she is too poor to buy?

She will not have any customs duties, and internal-revenue taxes she will be unable to pay. How shall she avoid intervention on our part to maintain her independence if her independence, her peace, and good order are hazarded by poverty? How shall she preserve and defend our rights in the island if she is in such turmoil as to imperil her own? How shall she protect her cities and our Southern coast by costly sanitation if she has not the means to secure it?

I say to you, my friends, that to impose these obligations upon that people, knowing their poverty, and then to cast them helpless adrift, is not of a piece with that splendid chapter in the world's history and in our history that records our rescue of Cuba from the domination of Spain.

I assert as a fundamental proposition that a stable government is possible only to a contented people. The world's history of revolutions and insurrections is the bloody record of discontent. And I assert, furthermore, that to insure peace and tranquillity to any people you must have prosperous industrial conditions; that poverty and bankruptcy are the efficient causes of popular uprisings and of crimes against law and order.

Now, what is Cuba's situation as to her industrial condition? At the beginning of our war with Spain the people of Cuba were in a deplorable situation. Weyler's policy of cruelty had resulted in starvation, insanity, and death. Cuba's industries were entirely prostrated. Her fields were waste, her factories were dismantled. Her rich had become poor; her poor had become destitute and desperate. Domestic comfort and happiness were unknown. Labor found no employment. Poor, distracted, persecuted Cuba was bankrupt—bankrupt even of hope.

Notwithstanding that situation, no sooner had relief arrived by reason of American intervention than the Cuban put all his energies to work to reestablish himself, to build up the waste places, to replant her fields and rebuild her factories. Such capital as the Cuban had he invested in repairing losses. Wherever he could he borrowed. He mortgaged the future, and he had commendable success. The crop of sugar in 1900 was 300,073 tons. In 1901 it had grown to 615,000 tons, and during this year the crop will amount to between 800,000 and 900,000 tons. But unfortunately Cuba's apparent wealth is the cause of her poverty and distress. Cuba has substantially but one industry, and that is sugar.

More than one-half of all the inhabitants of Cuba directly and indirectly depend upon sugar for their sustenance; not the rich planters alone, but the humble colonos, the men who cultivate little farms in cane, not exceeding on an average 27 acres. Now, owing to the overproduction of sugar in the world's market, by reason of the bounty system of Europe, the price of sugar has fallen below the cost of production, and as a consequence—is it not too apparent for argument?—Cuba again for the second time faces bankruptcy. Let me show you what the real situation of things is, from a person who knows. I have here a letter from General Wood, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. He says:

> Planters have exhausted their resources, and a crisis, bringing with it financial ruin to the agricultural industries of the island, and through them to its commerce, is imminent. The people of this island are entitled to the greatest praise for what they have accomplished in the three years following the war. They have brought the sugar production up to a point where it will this year be two-thirds of the maximum output of the island. They have done this with the balance of trade against them to the extent of $30,000,000 during the past three years; however, in accomplishing this result they have invested not only all their reserve capital but have borrowed heavily.
> Had the price of sugar continued at the normal average of former years their labors would have resulted in success, but the large production of bounty-fed sugars and East Indian sugars has resulted in a competition forcing the prices of sugar to a point lower than ever before known, and Cuba finds herself to-day financially exhausted, an enormous crop of cane sugar in her fields, and forced to compete with highly protected American sugar and the bounty-fed sugar of Europe, her sugars receiving no consideration whatever.
> It is impossible for her to continue the struggle under present conditions; relief must be granted, and granted quickly, or a condition will arise in the island which will render the establishment and maintenance of a stable government highly improbable. A reasonable concession now will enable the regeneration and reconstruction of the island to continue. It will induce immigration and build up the industries of the island and its commerce.

Now, that is the testimony, not of any mere on-looker, not of any visitor to Cuba upon pleasure or otherwise, but of the man who has presided over the destinies of Cuba ever since the American Army occupied its soil; and if that be the condition of things, what is to be done? Cuba is about to inaugurate a new government. She is about to enter upon a new and untried field, which will call for the exercise of all the virtues upon which the success of republican government depends. And we are standing by, our pledge still fresh in our minds, a pledge for which we went to war, that we will secure to her a stable government and insure to her citizens peace and tranquillity.

Now, under these circumstances, what, I submit to you, is our duty? Have we any advice? Yes. From beyond the confines of the tomb at Canton comes the voice of the President, who, being dead, yet speaketh; and I invite you to his conception of the duty that now confronts us:

> We must see to it that free Cuba be a reality, not a name; a perfect entity, not a hasty experiment bearing within itself the elements of failure. Our mission to accomplish which we took up the wager of battle is not to be fulfilled by turning adrift any loosely framed commonwealth to face the vicissitudes which too often attend weaker States, whose natural wealth and abundant resources are offset by the incongruities of their political organization, and the recurring occasions for internal rivalries to sap their strength and dissipate their energies.

That is the conception of President McKinley as to our duty under the present circumstances and it is in the line of the argument I would impress upon this committee, that we carry out and do not forget the mission upon which we entered when we took up arms for Cuba in the cause of humanity.

Now, then, it is apparent that if we are going to accomplish this mission, as I have defined it, we must do something for Cuba. No gentleman who has participated in this debate so far as I have heard has denied that proposition—we must do something for Cuba. Now, what shall it be? In what shape shall the relief come? Is there any advice which has been offered to us, and what is that advice? Yea, verily. From the military governor of Cuba, from the Secretary of War, from the dead President and the living President, from the influential press of the country, from pulpit and platform, and from private sources all over this country comes a demand for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba. Let me show you. Governor Wood says:

> Cuba has submitted a proposition of reciprocity which will turn to the United States $34,000,000 of the $37,000,000 of her trade which last year went to Europe, and under conditions of increasing agricultural and commercial prosperity her trade will soon be among the most valuable which we have. To-day it amounts to a little less than $70,000,000. With conditions of confidence and prosperity it will probably soon reach $150,000,000—a trade well worth cultivating—and of this amount at least $144,000,000 should come from the United States.

We are bound to maintain a stable government there. We must protect our Southern seacoast from infection from Cuba; in other words, we are bound to protect Cuba, politically and territorially, and maintain her in a sanitary condition. Unless we permit her industries to live she will not have the resources to do it, and we shall have to again take hold of the work and do over again what we have already accomplished.

Next comes the Secretary of War, who says:

Our present duty to Cuba can be performed by the making of such reciprocal tariff arrangements with her as President McKinley urged in his last words to his countrymen at Buffalo on the 5th of September. A reasonable reduction in our duties upon Cuban sugar and tobacco in exchange for fairly compensatory reductions of Cuban duties upon American products will answer the purpose, and I strongly urge that such an arrangement be promptly made.

And again:

Aside from the moral obligation to which we committed ourselves when we drove Spain out of Cuba, and aside from the ordinary considerations of commercial advantage involved in a reciprocity treaty, there are the weightiest reasons of American public policy pointing in the same direction; for the peace of Cuba is necessary to the peace of the United States; the health of Cuba is necessary to the health of the United States; the independence of Cuba is necessary to the safety of the United States. The same considerations that led to the war with Spain now require that a commercial arrangement be made under which Cuba can live. The condition of the sugar and tobacco industries in Cuba is already such that the earliest possible action by Congress upon this subject is desirable.

Then comes the President of the United States, who says:

Elsewhere I have discussed the question of reciprocity. In the case of Cuba, however, there are weighty reasons of morality and of national interest why the policy should be held to have a peculiar application, and I most earnestly ask your attention to the wisdom—indeed, to the vital need—of providing for a substantial reduction in the tariff duties on Cuban imports into the United States.

Cuba has in her constitution affirmed what we desired, that she should stand, in international matters, in closer and more friendly relations with us than with any other power; and we are bound by every consideration of honor and expediency to pass commercial measures in the interest of her material well-being. (Message of the President, December 3, 1901.)

Here, then, are suggestions all in the same line, proposing the same thing. Now, it is no secret; on the contrary, it is a matter of public notoriety, that when this problem came to the Committee on Ways and Means for solution they found a divergence of views within their own circle. The consequence was that they came here and asked the advice of their fellow Republicans.

The result of a number of conferences was an instruction to the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee to bring in this bill. This bill, therefore, is a Republican bill. It is a bill in line with General Wood's recommendation. It is a bill that conforms to the policy of President McKinley and of President Roosevelt and of the Secretary of War and of the press of the country, and I verily believe of a majority of all the people of this country without respect to party.

I need not stop now at this stage of the debate to show that it is a simple business proposition, as I have said, proposing reciprocal trade relations between the United States and Cuba—20 per cent off our tariff at this end upon her products and an equivalent reduction of the tariff duties at the other end upon our products. Now, that seems to be on its face a fair proposition and unobjectionable; yet objections have been made to it, and I propose to take up those objections one by one and to give you my answer to them.

It is said, in the first place, that the Cubans will suffer no loss upon their sugar production. Well, that depends upon how much it costs Cuba to make sugar, and how much she can get for sugar when made in the market. The consensus of opinion of all witnesses before the committee was that the cost of making sugar in Cuba was 2 cents a pound. Mr. Atkins, a sugar planter for twenty-five years in the island of Cuba, testified that the average cost of production was 2.16 cents a pound.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Did Mr. Atkins refuse to say what it actually cost him? I was not present at the hearings.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Atkins refused to give the items from his books. He did not want to disclose his business.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Did he give the actual cost to him?

Mr. DALZELL. Two and sixteen one-hundredths.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Was that the average or the cost to him?

Mr. DALZELL. That was the average cost to him.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. To him?

Mr. DALZELL. To him.

Mr. Bliss, our collector at the port of Habana, examined personally the books, item by item, of 12 different establishments, and he testified that in every case, with one single exception, the cost of producing sugar was over 2 cents a pound, 2 cents and a fraction. There was one case where it was 1.98 and a fraction.

Mr. Saylor, an agent of the Agricultural Department, testified that in 1898 he had made an examination of the sugar industry in Cuba and Porto Rico, and he testified that the cost of production was from 1.50 to 1.75; but he testified also that that was in 1898, and that wages had risen since that time from 50 to 100 per cent. And this, by the way, explains the find that my friend, the gentleman from Minnesota, made when delving in the archives of the Spanish Commission. He found that in 1894, 1895, and 1896 sugar was produced in Cuba at $1.60 a hundred.

I have no doubt of it. It was produced up to 1898 at $1.66 a hundred, but since that time, according to the testimony, wages have increased from 50 to 100 per cent. But let us say 50 per cent, and that would make the cost of sugar to which he refers, that which he found delving among the Spanish Commission archives, $2.42 a hundred. So that I am justified in saying upon all the testimony, and fairly justified, that the average cost of sugar in Cuba this last year was $2 a hundred, or 2 cents a pound.

Now, on the 1st of April or thereabouts, sugar was worth in Cuba, free on board, in the ports of Habana and Matanzas and other ports, $1.81, so that at a cost of 2 cents a pound the loss to the Cuban planter would be .19 of a cent, or 19 cents a hundred, or $3.80 a ton. So that the proposition that the Cuban planter will sustain no loss on this year's crop goes by the board when we come to examine the testimony, because we can come to no other result than that the Cuban planter under existing circumstances must lose $3.80 a ton.

Now, let us take the other horn of the dilemma—and, by the way, these two propositions, the first that the Cuban planter would lose nothing, and the second that our concession would not help him because it is too small, were both made in the same speech. Take the other horn of the dilemma—that our concession will not reach his trouble—and let us see how that comes out. The duty on Cuban sugar is 1.685, and 20 per cent of that is 0.337. The concession therefore is 0.348. Add 0.348 to 1.81—the price of sugar at Habana and the other ports of Cuba—and you have 15 cents a hundred profit, or $3 a ton. So I care not which horn of the dilemma you accept—whether you say the Cuban planter suffers no loss, or whether you say that this concession will not meet his loss—in either event, the evidence is a refutation of both assertions.

But the next proposition is that this concession will not go to the sugar planters; that it will go to the trust. Oh, my friends, when you have a bad argument, a poor cause, a failing cause, have no fear. Simply shut your eyes and cry "Trust." If you find no satisfaction within the domain of reason, desert it and enter the domain of passion and unreasoning prejudice, and denounce trusts. No such argument, no such demagogic cry, can meet the necessities of this case, because it is capable of being reasoned out upon the facts that are in evidence.

Why, on principle this concession ought to go to the sugar planter of Cuba. Why? Everybody concedes that the price of sugar is fixed in Hamburg. We have not anything at all to do with the fixing of the price of sugar primarily; it is fixed in Hamburg. The New York price of sugar, therefore, is the Hamburg price, plus the cost of carriage, plus the duty, and plus the countervailing duty. The price of Cuban sugar in Habana is the New York price, less the duty and less the cost of carriage. The price of Porto Rican sugar at San Juan is the New York price, less the cost of carriage, because there is no duty on it. The cost of Hawaiian sugar at Honolulu is the New York price, less the cost of carriage, because there is no duty on that.

Now, why is it, I want to know, that this economic law does not apply in the case of Cuba as it does in the case of all other countries? Why, they tell you it is because there is only one market and there is only one buyer in that market. I deny it. I read from the testimony of Mr. Post, given before the committee. Mr. Post is a partner in the firm of B. H. Howell, Son & Co., raw and refined sugar commission merchants in New York, and agent for the following three sugar refineries: Mollenhauer, New York, and National.

He says:

There are eight or ten of these refineries, making from 20,000 to 22,000 barrels of sugar per day. These refineries are located in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, New Orleans, Texas, and San Francisco. If you want their names, I will be glad to give them to you.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give their names?

Mr. POST. These refineries are Mollenhauer——

The CHAIRMAN. And give the annual output of each.

Mr. POST. I will.

Capacity per day.

	Barrels.
Mollenhauer Refinery	3,000
New York Refinery	4,000
National Refinery	3,000
Arbuckle Refinery	4,000
McCahan Refinery, of Philadelphia	3,000
Nash, Spaulding Refinery, of Boston	1,000
Henderson Refinery, of New Orleans	1,000
Gramercy Refinery, of New Orleans	1,000
Hawaiian Refinery, of San Francisco	1,500
Cunningham Refinery, of Texas	500
Total	22,000

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Are these independent refineries?
Mr. POST. They are independent, except the three I represent—the National, New York, and Mollenhauer—these three being together.
Mr. MCCLELLAN. I mean independent of the trust.
Mr. POST. Independent of the trust, yes, sir; they all buy their sugars as they please and they sell them in competition.

Mr. SHAFROTH. How does the gentleman reconcile that with the statement of Mr. Havemeyer before the Industrial Commission that the sugar trust controlled 90 per cent of the output of sugar in this country?

Mr. DALZELL. I reconcile it by saying that either Mr. Havemeyer was mistaken or that a different condition of things prevailed when he made that answer (which was some time ago) from that which prevailed when this answer was given, because the record shows that of the sugar refined in this country last year 58 per cent was refined by the so-called "trust" and 42 per cent by these ten independent refineries.

But even if there were only one buyer instead of many in the market, there is only one price in the New York market. There can be only one prevailing price in a given market at a given time. There is no difference in sugars, except as to their saccharine strength. The American Sugar Refining Company does not know many times whence its sugar comes. It buys sugar in bond on the day it needs it, and pays the New York price.

But in addition to all that, from time immemorial, without a break, Louisiana sugar, Porto Rican sugar, Cuban sugar, Hawaiian sugar have all sold in the New York market at the New York price—all on the same basis less the cost of carriage, and where there was a duty, with the duty added. And what has taken place in the past will take place in the future. There is no reason why there should be any change. There is no reason why the economic law that has prevailed throughout all these years should not continue to prevail in the future.

But, in addition to all that, it is proven that when the duty was taken off Porto Rican sugar the benefit of the remission of duty inured to the Porto Rican. It was proven that when the duty was taken off the Hawaiian sugar the benefit inured to the Hawaiians.

As against this, what have we? We have the most ingenious argument of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS], who gets together a lot of figures and works an equation to prove that the Hawaiian does not get the benefit of the remission of duty; that the Porto Rican does not get the benefit of the remission of duty, and therefore the Cuban will not get the benefit of this reduction. Why, let me show you his calculation; it is in the shape of an equation. It is fearfully and wonderfully made. It reads this way:

$$3.40+0.12+0.23+0.05-3.80=2.20+0.08+0.27+1.63\text{—total, } 4.18.$$

Therefore the Cubans will not get the benefit of this reduction of duty! Why, he says it works out with the exactness of a theorem in Euclid, and I grant you that it does, and it has just as much to do with this case as a theorem in Euclid. What is it that we are inquiring about? We are inquiring about a question of fact.

Why, sir, no man undertakes to solve a question of fact by an algebraic or geometrical problem. If I want to know, my friend, whether you have received a certain amount of money on a certain day, I do not sit down and say, "x plus y equals z." I simply ask you whether you have received the money or not. Facts are proved, not by figures, but by evidence. And the evidence on this score is beyond all dispute and controversy.

Let me read it to you. Here is the testimony of Mr. Mendoza before the Committee on Ways and Means:

The struggle here seems to more against the sugar trust than against Cuba. The American Sugar Refining Company and Mr. Havemeyer are mentioned more frequently than Cuba. Some one said that we were influenced by them because we had asked for free raw sugar. We did not think of any other sugar, because raw sugar is the only kind we produce.

Whatever reduction is made, I do not see how it can go to anyone else than to the planter and the laborers, just as it has in the case of Hawaii and Porto Rico. There is only one price for sugar in the New York market, and if a reduction is made the benefit of it will go to the sugar grower. No sugar has yet been sold, so I do not see how the sugar trust can own it.

Here is the testimony of Mr. Atkins:

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to go back again to the price of the raw sugar of Hawaii landed in New York. How does that compare with the price of your raw sugar from Cuba?

Mr. ATKINS. The price the refiner pays for Hawaiian sugar landed at New York is just exactly the same as for a cargo landed from Cuba. The difference is that the seller of Hawaiian sugar gets 3½ cents for a pound and I get 3½ cents from the refiner, but I have to go to the United States custom-house and pay them 1.68 cents before I can withdraw my sugar from the warehouse.

Mr. METCALF. Going back to the question of free trade and reciprocity with Hawaii in 1876, was the price of sugar to the consumer reduced at all?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; the effect of the admission of the sugars of the Hawaiian Islands was to give the difference to the producers of the Sandwich Islands.

Here is what Mr. MONDELL, a member of the House, says in his recent speech. He had spent a month in Honolulu and conversed with the sugar planters there.

I wanted to know whether that organization, the sugar trust, had been able to rob the American planter of any of the benefits derived from free access to our markets.

The planters with whom I talked informed me that they had an agreement whereby they sold their sugar to the agents of the American refineries at a price equivalent to the New York price of sugar on the day their sugar landed in San Francisco, less the difference in freight rates. I ask the attention of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS] to this as the testimony of Hawaiian planters themselves three years ago. The gentleman has contended that the Hawaiian planter is not getting the full benefit of the relief from the payment of the American duty, whereas Hawaiian planters said to me—and a number of them made the same statement—that they had an agreement whereby they were paid for their sugar, on the day it landed in San Francisco, the price of the same quality of sugar, duty paid, on the same day in the markets of New York, less an agreed adjustment of freights. So they received absolutely all that their sugar was worth and all of the benefit of the remission of tariff duty.

Here is the testimony of our consul at Hawaii, Mr. Haywood:

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to know the relation of the price in Hawaii to the price in New York.

Mr. HAYWOOD. As I understand it, several plantations in Hawaii make a contract to sell their sugars for three years at the price in New York. The day the cargo arrives there that price is fixed, as I understand it, and, as the committee has been told in the last several days, by the price of sugar in Hamburg.

The CHAIRMAN. As you understand, they get their full price for their Hawaiian sugar?

Mr. HAYWOOD. They get the full price that sugar is selling for in New York as soon as sugars arrive there.

The CHAIRMAN. And how long has that been?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Those contracts?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Since I first went there, about five years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. So, notwithstanding the fact that the American sugar trust is the only customer of the Hawaiian sugar, that gets a full price for it?

Mr. HAYWOOD. They get the price the day the sugar arrives in New York, whatever that may be.

Mr. Oxnard has just made a suggestion that we do not get the same price for our sugar in San Francisco. I think it is three-sixteenths less in San Francisco than the price paid for the sugar that goes to New York.

The CHAIRMAN. What proportion of the sugar goes to San Francisco?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I do not think that the greater portion goes there; I think the greater portion goes to New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Since you have been producing more?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. More than the Pacific coast needs?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I presume so; yes, sir.

Mr. LONG. What is the reason for the difference of three-sixteenths?

Mr. HAYWOOD. As I understand it, the reason given by the purchasers is to cover freight.

Mr. LONG. Freight from San Francisco?

Mr. HAYWOOD. From San Francisco to New York.

So that, relying upon the undisputed testimony and banishing from our minds for the time being this ghost of a "trust," it is perfectly apparent that if this 20 per cent be taken by this bill off sugar coming into the United States the benefit of this reduction will go to help the sugar planters of Cuba.

But my friend from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] says, "What is the sugar trust lobbying here for?" I will answer him. Since this controversy began I have never seen, spoken with, or been approached by a solitary representative of the American or any other sugar refining company. On the other hand, my life has been made miserable by the lobbyists of the beet-sugar business. They have swarmed in these corridors. They have camped in the room of the Committee on Ways and Means, and when I came through from the other end of the Capitol, in the morning, on my way to my committee room, they have followed me along the corridor, pouring into my ears their plea. They swarmed in the galleries the other day and joined in the well-merited applause that followed the speech of my friend from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH], for it was a splendid speech. It was eloquent; it was scholarly; it was a good protection speech. It had only one fault—it had no relevancy to the subject before the House. [Laughter.]

One other argument has been used to prove that this concession would not go to the sugar planter. In the Republican conferences it was argued and it was argued here that it would not go to the sugar planter of Cuba, because, forsooth, this octopus, this sugar trust had already gobbled up all the sugars of Cuba, and that argument prevailed and seemed to have some weight until the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. PAYNE] made his speech in the House the other day and presented this telegram, which I will read, from General Wood, going to show that the sugar of Cuba is in the hands of the sugar planters of Cuba. The telegram is as follows:

Copy of cablegram received at War Department April 2, 1902.

HABANA, ————.

EDWARDS, War Department, Washington:

Telegrams sent to 194 sugar centrals, to which 126 answers have been received to date; also telegrams sent to 33 Cuban banking firms, to which 34 replies have been received.

Figures, according to replies received, as follows:

	Long tons.
Output for the year to March 25	584,259
Amount actually in hands of planters	217,561
Sold and delivered to island firms	194,913
Contracted for in the island and not yet delivered	43,578
Pledged as security for loans in the island, but not sold	235,222
Held at the option of the American Sugar Refining Company	3,285
Held at option of other American purchasers	2,285
Exported to the United States	25,646

All sugar above mentioned, except that at the option of American Sugar Refining Company and other American purchasers, is in the hands of Cuban planters and Cuban and Spanish commission houses doing business in the island of Cuba and is not at the option of anyone. Where held as security for loans advanced to planters, the planters will get the advantage of any raise in price under conditions of deposit, as is the custom in the island. This statement shows conclusively the absolute falsity of the declarations that the sugar trusts have control of considerable portion of Cuban sugar crop. Other statements will be furnished as soon as possible.

WOOD, Military Governor.

Received at War Department April 7, 1902.

HABANA, April 7, 1902.

Captain EDWARDS,
War Department, Washington:

Reference your telegram to-day, telegrams sent to 194 sugar centrals, as previously reported in my telegram 2d instant. Ten additional replies received since, which report as follows:

	Long tons.
Output for the year	24,755
Amount in hands of planters	13,200
Sold and delivered	11,311
Contracted for with island firms but not delivered	3,019
Pledged as security for loans in island but not sold	1,546

All sugar above mentioned is in hands of planters and Cuban and Spanish commission houses doing business in the islands with the exception of 2,368 long tons exported to United States. None at option of American Sugar Refining Company nor other American purchasers. Where held as security for loans, planters will get advantage of rise in price, as stated in telegram of 2d instant. Two remaining banking firms replied: "Do not make loans on sugar." Above amounts should be added to my cable of April 3. No change in situation.

WOOD, Military Governor.

And then, upon the reading of this telegram, lo and behold—and I give them credit for their ingenuity—our friends upon the other side made a flip-flop, turning a summersault so quick you could hardly see them, and abandoned that argument and came in and read an article from the New York Journal of Commerce which quoted the last annual report of the American Sugar Refining Company to show that it had $10,000,000 of sugar less on hand now than it had at the same time last year, and they said, "Look at it, look at it; this trust is waiting on this legislation, and they are not buying!" Well, my friends, I will tell you why they are not buying. They are not buying because the Cuban planter will not sell. He is the party who is waiting on this legislation, and not the American Sugar Refining Company. [Applause.]

Now, my friends, my time is passing rapidly. I have answered every argument that has been advanced during this discussion going to show that this bill will not effect its purpose by carrying relief to the Cuban sugar planter, every one of them, and I come now to the question of whether it will injure the beet-sugar industry.

Now, there is a starting point upon that subject which renders the discussion more easy, and that is this: It is conceded by everyone that this bill will not alter the price of sugar to the American consumer a single solitary mill. That is conceded, and in the nature of things it could not be otherwise, because if you come to consider that our annual consumption is about two and a half millions of tons, that our annual production is about 900,000 tons, and that includes cane and beet sugar, and includes Porto Rico and Hawaii, it necessarily follows that we must import 1,600,000 tons of sugar. Of those 1,600,000 tons of sugar, Cuba can not furnish more than 850,000 tons, and we must therefore import outside 750,000 tons of sugar.

That being the case, need I stultify myself by standing here to argue that this concession would not make an iota of a mill of difference in the cost of sugar to the consumer? Will my friends answer me this question: If the American beet-sugar producer can sell his sugar in the market for the same price after this bill is passed that he sells it before the bill is passed, how is he hurt? Will any gentleman undertake to answer that question?

Oh, they say it will arrest the spread of the industry. Well, if the industry is making money now and if sugar will sell at the same price after the passage of this bill as before, how will it arrest the spread of the industry? Answer me that question. Oh, they say—they did say, but I think they have abandoned it—sugar production will increase in Cuba so as to come in competition with the sugar production in the United States. How much, I ask, can sugar production increase in Cuba in the next ten months?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It doubled in the last year, nearly.

Mr. CONNELL. What about the consumption in this country every year?

Mr. DALZELL. Why, the consumption increases at a remarkable rate. I have the figures somewhere. We consume 65 pounds of sugar per capita now.

Mr. PAYNE. It increases 7 per cent every year.

Mr. DALZELL. But, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen, I go a step further. I say that beet sugar in this country does not require any protection, and the witness I call to support that proposition is the most prominent beet-sugar producer in the United States, and the one who has headed the lobby that has infested this capital for the last six weeks, and I am going to read to you what he says. It has been referred to oftentimes, but never read. I am going to read to you what he said. Mr. Oxnard, in 1899, said:

Perhaps it may be well to draw attention to one or two features of the industry:

(1) Its product is a staple of universal consumption and of the readiest sale.

(2) The product is a finished article, the sugar being turned out refined and granulated, the manufacturer not being dependent upon the refiners' trust for his market.

(3) Competition by home production is so remote as to be scarcely worth consideration. The United States is now compelled to import three-quarters of its consumption, and it would take at least 300 factories of a daily capacity of 500 tons of beets to produce present importation.

Regarding the future development and permanency of the beet-sugar industry in the United States there can be absolutely no doubt, for the following reasons:

(1) Of the tropical countries which it is proposed to annex to the United States, Porto Rico is too small to cut any figure, and the Philippine Islands have not the necessary elements for the expansion of the sugar business sufficiently rapid to give any concern to those interested in the production of sugar from beets in this country for the next twenty-five years to come.

(2) The island of Cuba is so situated that its sugar industry can rapidly recover the ground lost during the insurrection, provided that the labor question there can be satisfactorily settled. There is, however, no fear that Cuban production, even under an annexation to the United States, can in our day expand to the point where the United States would become exporters of sugar instead of importers, and hence that protection would no longer protect.

(3) Greater than all the above assurances of the permanence of the sugar industry in this country is the fact that sugar can be produced cheaper here than it can be in Europe. The sugar industry is, after all, merely an agricultural one. We can undersell Europe in the production of all other crops, and sugar is no exception. The sugar consumed in the civilized world consists of 3,000,000 tons of cane sugar grown in the Tropics and 5,000,000 tons of beet sugar grown on the continent of Europe. Therefore in considering any given sugar enterprise, if it can meet and overcome the competition of sugar on the continent of Europe, it is perfectly safe to say that it has a permanent future.

Now, Mr. Oxnard says that he was mistaken, because he based his calculation upon figures that did not materialize. I deny it. I read from this same circular that these figures are based upon his experience in the beet-sugar business in the States of California and Nebraska, and he says that the figures instead of being extravagant are conservative.

And over against any denial, in addition to that statement, I put the further fact that when Mr. Oxnard made that statement he had been nine years in the beet-sugar business, and there had been then produced and marketed of beet sugar in the United States 300,000 tons. So that I have here, as I say, the testimony of the most prominent beet-sugar man in this country to the effect that beet sugar needs no protection. Furthermore, he was justified by the figures of the beet-sugar industry.

According to the United States census bulletin the average price paid for a ton of 2,000 pounds of beets in the United States is $4.39. The average per cent of sucrose carried by the beets is 14.5 per cent. But suppose we assume only 12 per cent, or 240 pounds of refined sugar to a ton of beets. One hundred tons of beets at $4.39 per ton equals $439. Manufacturing at $3 per ton, Mr. Oxnard's figure, equals $300. A 12 per cent yield of sugar would make the cost of 24,000 pounds of refined sugar $739, or a little less than 3 cents and 1 mill per pound.

The average price of granulated sugar during the last year was 5.05 cents per pound. On this basis the beet-sugar producer had a profit of about 2 cents a pound, or $40 a ton. But suppose we say that Mr. Oxnard was mistaken as to his $3 for the cost of manufacture, and call it $4. Then we have the cost of beets and manufacture $839 instead of $739, and the cost per hundred pounds $3.41. The profit then would be $1.64 per hundred, or $32.80 per ton.

Now, it is manifest that upon any basis of figures for which we have testimony Mr. Oxnard was right when he said that beet sugar needed no protection.

But there is no contention here that beet sugar shall not receive protection. The claim that this bill is inconsistent with protection is simply ridiculous. Republican platforms have been appealed to. Will gentlemen point to any Republican platform that ever guaranteed a particular rate of duty on any particular article? Protection means principle, not schedules.

There is no proposition here to remove from beet sugar any adequate protection. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] was unfortunate when, appealing to me a little while ago, he sought to draw a parallel between tin plate and beet sugar. Why, we took 50 per cent of the duty off tin plate, and nobody pretended that we were depriving it of protection, and it flourished and grew until now it fills the entire market. Think of talking about depriving beet sugar of protection when you leave 70 per cent of protection on it.

Mr. TAWNEY. How does that compare with glass, with 154 per cent?

Mr. DALZELL. I do not care how it agrees with anything else. It is more than sufficient to protect the article, which, according to its chief apostle, needs no protection at all. And when gentlemen talk about a violation of Republican pledges and Republican platforms, they simply indulge in a hysteria that has deprived them of their good, calm, deliberate judgment. Thus far I have demonstrated that the pending measure will bring relief to Cuba and that it will not injure any American industry, and is therefore not in conflict with the doctrine of protection.

I might well rest the case here. But it is argued that the reciprocity of this bill is at war with Republican principles. One gentleman has said that this is not Blaine reciprocity, is not McKinley reciprocity, is not Dingley reciprocity. In that he is mistaken, as I will show.

In 1890, when the McKinley bill was under consideration, Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State, made a recommendation to President Harrison in which he said:

To escape the delay and uncertainty of treaties, an amendment to the pending tariff bill authorizing the President to declare the ports of the United States free to all the products of any nation of the American hemisphere upon which no export duties are imposed, whenever, and so long as, such nations shall admit to its ports, free of all national, provincial (State), municipal, and other taxes, our flour, corn meal, and other breadstuffs, preserved meats, fish, vegetables and fruits, cotton-seed oil, rice, and other provisions, including all articles of food, lumber, furniture, and other articles of wood, agricultural implements and machinery, mining and mechanical machinery, structural steel and iron, steel rails, locomotives, railway cars and supplies, street cars, and refined petroleum.

I mention these particular articles because they have been most frequently referred to as those with which a valuable exchange could be readily affected. The list could, no doubt, be profitably enlarged by a careful investigation of the needs and advantages of both the home and foreign markets.

* * * * * * *

Of course, the exchanges involved in these propositions would be rendered impossible if Congress, in its wisdom, should repeal the duty on sugar by direct legislation, instead of allowing the same object to be attained by the reciprocal arrangements suggested.

His letter was forwarded to Congress by President Harrison in a message in which, amongst other things, he said:

If after the Congress shall have acted upon pending tariff legislation it shall appear that, under the general treaty-making power or under any special powers given by law, our trade with the States represented in the conference can be enlarged upon a basis of mutual advantage, it will be promptly done.

In response to these recommendations, the Ways and Means Committee embodied in the McKinley bill its well-known reciprocity feature, which, while it provided for free sugar, provided also for a duty on sugar as against all countries that would not make reciprocal agreements with us for favorable entry of our products into their markets.

Under the reciprocal feature of the McKinley bill we made treaties with a number of nations whereby in consideration of letting sugar come into our markets free we obtained equivalent concessions for our goods in their markets. These nations were Cuba, British West Indies, Brazil, Porto Rico, Dominican Republic, British Guiana, Nicaragua, Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala, Germany, Austria-Hungary. In point of fact the era of the McKinley bill was an era of reciprocity, during which the chief factor in our reciprocity dealings was sugar.

All of these treaties were abrogated by the Democratic party when it came into power, and for that abrogation we denounced that party in the Republican platform of 1896.

When the Dingley bill came to be drawn, provision was made therein for reciprocity; reciprocity by treaties to be approved by Congress, and commercial agreements to be made by the President. Under the Dingley law reciprocity treaties now exist with France, Germany, Portugal, and Italy, and a number of other treaties are pending in the Senate, awaiting action thereon.

What Mr. Dingley's view of the subject was may be gathered from a report submitted by the Ways and Means Committee, from which I will read.

In submitting their report, signed by every Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee (including Mr. TAWNEY, of Minnesota) and headed by Mr. Dingley, the committee say:

In submitting this report and the testimony that accompanies it your committee can not refrain from again calling attention to the unanimity of opinion among the commercial and industrial associations of the United States that the reciprocity arrangements negotiated under the tariff act of 1890 were of great benefit to the United States, that their repeal was a public calamity, and that the policy they represented shall be permanently adopted in our tariff legislation.

What Mr. Roosevelt thinks upon this subject appears from what I have already said. I am justified, therefore, in challenging the assertion of the gentleman from Minnesota when he would array against this bill the honored names of Blaine and McKinley and Dingley.

But before leaving this subject I want to submit some extracts from the Dingley report on reciprocity in the Fifty-fourth Congress. The question before us, I have heretofore said, is in one aspect a business question, and what I desire to submit has a bearing on that phase of the question. It will go to show what we may expect by way of material advantage from the adoption of this measure.

It is a report of the Committee on Ways and Means in the Fifty-fourth Congress concerning reciprocity and commercial treaties. I quote as to Cuban reciprocity:

The total exports of merchandise from the United States to Cuba during—

1891 (the year before the agreement)	$12,224,888
1892	17,953,570
1893	24,157,698
1894	20,125,321
1895 (after repeal of reciprocity)	12,887,661

As suggested by one of the millers who answered the inquiries of the committee:

"It is well to consider the growth of our flour trade with Cuba and Porto Rico during the continuance of this agreement, the exports of which to Cuba for the years named having been as follows:

	Barrels.
1891	114,441
1892	366,175
1893	616,406
1894	662,248

"Which shows a growth of more than 480 per cent, while our export flour to Cuba for the year ending June 30, 1895, the year after the annulment of our reciprocity treaty, fell off to 379,856 barrels, a loss of more than 42 per cent. This increase of flour trade with Cuba was not enjoyed by any other countries, as the exports of flour to Habana, the metropolis of that island, from Europe fell from 85,519 bags during the months of January, February, March, and April in 1891 to 4,268 bags during the same months in 1892. As I understand it, these same bags are figured at 140 pounds each.

"Under this arrangement similar advancements in our flour trade with Porto Rico were achieved, having been as follows:

	Barrels.
1891	127,983
1892	162,147
1893	200,053
1894	200,813

"Which shows a gain of about 60 per cent, while our flour export to Porto Rico for the year ending June 30, 1895, fell to 118,617 barrels, or a loss of about 40 per cent."

The committee says:

The most striking statement we have recorded on this subject is from the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, as follows:

"Our records show that, from the establishment of our line of steamers, December, 1893, from Pensacola, Fla., to Habana, Cuba, until the withdrawal of the reciprocity relations with Cuba, August, 1894, we handled from St. Louis as follows:

	Tons.
Flour (177,334 sacks)	17,733
Corn (218,787 sacks)	24,066
Oats (12,498 sacks)	1,000
Bran (7,231 sacks)	578
Hay (14,909 bales)	800
Total (20 months)	44,177

"Since that time to date we have handled:

Flour (43,761 sacks)	4,376
Bran (4,894 sacks)	391
Corn (4,828 sacks)	531
Hay (9,344 bales)	234
Total (19 months)	5,532

The manager of the New York and Cuba Mail Steamship Company, New York City, writes to the committee as follows:

"With the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty between the United States and Cuba, imports from this country have been made subject to the highest rates of duty. This has taken away our trade in railroad iron, cars, locomotives, machinery, etc., and has almost killed the trade in flour, provisions, and produce.

"The reduction of duties on provisions, cereals, and produce would restore the trade to the United States. In flour alone our trade would increase 500 per cent. On other products the volume of traffic would be many times greater than it now is. The volume of business was more than doubled under reciprocity arrangements. The Statistical Bureau of the Treasury Department will confirm this statement, and also demonstrate how the business has since fallen off, but it can not show to what extent our trade with Cuba would have increased had the influence of reciprocity continued a few years longer. The reciprocity enabled us to double our tonnage-carrying capacity to Cuba, and yet carry full cargoes. Its abrogation left us with the increased tonnage capacity, but with less than half cargoes."

What we have realized by way of reciprocity in the past we may reasonably expect to realize by way of reciprocity in the future.

The total imports into Cuba from the United States has been steadily falling. In 1899 Cuba imported goods from the United States valued at $29,580,657, not including coin, and from other countries $36,728,028. In 1900 she imported from the United States $29,225,123, and from other countries $37,239,344; while in 1901 she imported from the United States only $28,017,820, and from other countries $38,554,982.

The object of this bill is to secure to the producers of the United States the market for $38,554,982 of articles now purchased elsewhere.

As almost all of the needs of Cuba can be supplied by the industry of this country, a sufficient reduction of tariff duties in our favor will permit us to monopolize the Cuban market.

During the past year the United States sold Cuba only $3,702 of rice, while she bought from other countries $3,332,019; the United States sold her only $447,501 of cotton goods, while other countries sold her $5,637,126; the United States sold her $879,180 of shoes, and other countries $3,041,087; the United States sold her only $1,260,179 of cattle, while other countries sold her $6,091,688; and these figures apply to a year when Cuba was far from prosperous. If we permit her to become prosperous her imports of $60,000,000 will double, and with a sufficient reduction of her rates of duty we will derive the direct benefit of her prosperity.

If I have succeeded at all in the views that I have endeavored to present, I have made it plain that the pending measure is a measure both of honor and of profit, a measure deserving of support in the domain of morals and in the domain of business.

The gentleman from Minnesota has made a suggestion that ought to be noticed. He calls for the repeal of the differential, the duty on refined sugar.

In that he does himself an injustice. He announces himself a protectionist, and in the same breath he calls for Democratic support of an amendment to strike down protection. In other words, the banner that he uplifts bears the legend, "for sugar refined from beets, protection; for sugar refined from cane, free trade." He is inconsistent. He would turn over to England and the Continent the refining of raw sugars. But beet sugars are refined sugars, and he would bring into competition with them the refined sugars of the underpaid wage-earners of foreign countries. Why would he do this?

In answer to a popular prejudice, alarmed by the cry of a trust. But the American Sugar Refining Company, call it what you may, is an American company. The capital invested is American capital, the men employed are American wage-earners, paid American wages in good American dollars. The stockholders of the American Sugar Refining Company are numbered by the thousands. They are most of them plain people like the gentleman himself and myself; they represent estates, widows, orphans, investors dependent upon their investments for their sustenance. His appeal is not an appeal to reason, but an appeal to unreasoning prejudice. He will, himself, upon calm deliberation, think better of it and act, I am sure, like a wise American legislator. As for me, if I am to have refined sugar from a trust, then I want it from an American trust and not from a European trust. [Applause.]

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, it is said that we have done great things for Cuba. Yes; so we have. We have driven the tyrant from her shores, we have fed her hungry, restored to life her starving, kindled anew in her breast the fires of hope and human ambition. We have scoured her cities, taught her the religion of cleanliness, driven out disease, multiplied schools, founded hospitals, pointed the way to progress, made life a joy under her blue skies and in her balmy air. We have established law and order and introduced her to the enjoyment of the principles of Saxon liberty. We have shown her as orderly and brave an army as ever constituted garrison; as courteous, but firm and able, a general as ever served in camp or presided in council.

When the historian of the future shall come to record the beginnings of Cuban independence, I venture the prophecy that he will have no more worthy page than that devoted to Gen. Leonard Wood and his services in preparing Cuba for self-government. [Loud applause.]

We have shown Cuba the way in which she ought to walk, and we must not desert her now. Our task is not yet fully accomplished. Without even the suspicion of harm to ourselves we can give her I will not say generous, but just aid, and gloriously fulfill the mission on which unselfishly we entered in a war for humanity by adding her star to the constellation of the nations. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. A few minutes still remain. If there be no objection, the Clerk will now proceed with the reading of the bill. The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will proceed.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12765) to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of securing reciprocal trade relations with Cuba, the President is hereby authorized, as soon as may be after the establishment of an independent government in Cuba and the enactment by said government of immigration, exclusion, and contract-labor laws as fully restrictive of immigration as the laws of the United States, to enter into negotiations with said government with a view to the arrangement of a commercial agreement in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions may be secured in favor of the products and manufactures of the United States by rates of duty which shall be less by an amount equivalent to at least 20 per cent ad valorem upon such products and manufactures than the rates imposed upon the like articles when imported into Cuba from the most favored of other countries, and which shall not be greater than the rates imposed by the United States upon the like articles imported from Cuba; and whenever the government of Cuba shall enact such immigration, exclusion, and contract-labor laws, and shall enter into such commercial agreement with the United States, and shall make such concessions in favor of the products and manufactures thereof as aforesaid, and which agreement, in the judgment of the President, shall be reciprocal and equivalent, he shall be authorized to proclaim such facts both as to the enactment of such immigration, exclusion, and contract-labor laws and the making of such agreement; and thereafter until the 1st day of December, 1903, the imposition of the duties now imposed by law on all articles imported from Cuba, the products thereof, into the United States shall be suspended, and in lieu thereof there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all such articles imported from Cuba 80 per cent of the rate of duty now levied upon like articles imported from foreign countries. The President shall have power, and it shall be his duty, whenever he shall be satisfied that either such immigration, exclusion, or contract-labor laws or such agreement mentioned in this act are not being fully executed by the government of Cuba, to notify such government thereof, and thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles imported from Cuba the full rate of duty provided by law upon articles imported from foreign countries.

The committee amendments were read as follows:

On page 1, line 7, strike out the word "and." In same line, after the word "exclusion," insert the words "and contract labor."

On page 2, line 7, strike out the word "and." In same line, after the word "exclusion," insert the words "and contract labor."

On page 2, line 13, strike out the word "and."

On page 2, line 14, insert the words "and contract labor."

On page 2, line 24, strike out the word "or." In same line, after the word "exclusion," insert the words "or contract labor."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the vote be taken on all the committee amendments in gross.

The CHAIRMAN. Is a separate vote demanded on the committee amendments? If not, the Chair will submit them in gross.

A separate vote not being demanded, the question was taken on the amendments in gross, and they were agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY, Mr. MORRIS, and Mr. CORLISS addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague [Mr. MORRIS].

Mr. MORRIS. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after "countries," line 22, page 2, the following:

"And upon the making of said agreement, and the issuance of said proclamation, and while said agreement shall remain in force, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in lieu of the duties thereon now provided by law on all sugars above No. 16 Dutch standard in color, and on all sugar which has gone through a process of refining, imported into the United States, 1 cent and eight hundred and twenty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to the bill. This bill purports and does reduce the duty on Cuban products imported into the United States.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order and ask the gentleman to speak loud enough for us to hear.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order, and gentlemen will suspend other business.

Mr. PAYNE. This bill has for its object and purpose the reducing of duties on imports on the products of Cuba and Cuba alone 20 per cent from the Dingley rates, upon the President having made a reciprocal trade arrangement with Cuba, and upon their complying with other conditions precedent. These rates are to be reduced and the reduction is to obtain only while the Cuban government shall enforce the laws to be enacted and shall carry out their reciprocal agreement. It does not propose to interfere with the duty upon any article produced in any other country of the world. It does not in any manner propose any general taxation, any general revenue law. This amendment introduces a new subject into the bill. This amendment proposes to take off a certain portion of the duty upon refined sugar, and the duty on the refined sugar received from any other country than Cuba as well as from Cuba.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it would seem after that statement of the bill and statement of the amendment that it was only necessary to read the rule in reference to an amendment being germane:

And no motion or proposition on the subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

Here is another subject; here is another proposition differing from that under consideration which is asked to be brought in and to be added to this bill. It is a change of the bill from a reciprocal trade relation with a single country to a general amendment of the tariff laws upon the imports from the world at large.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that the decree has gone out from the other side of the House that the rules of the House are to be brushed aside in the interests of what they want in the way of tariff reform and tariff amendment. I am not informed that this side of the House proposes to brush away the rules. True, we have heard declarations against the rules of the House; true, we have heard the gentlemen who have special interests at stake in their districts, about which they have not succeeded in getting legislation, talking against the rules of the House; but when we stop to think that the rules of the House are the combined wisdom and judgment of the Representatives of the people for the last one hundred years, rules representing the wisdom and growth of men like Garfield, Blaine, Blackburn, Mr. Carlisle, and Mr. Crisp, of Reed, and of Dingley, when we consider that these rules are the outgrowth of the best judgment of the best men and representatives of the people who have appeared in the House of Representatives for the last fifty years, they can not be considered as cobwebs to be lightly brushed aside. Every man will, when he comes to decide the question, I trust, decide it upon his conscience and his honor as a judge in this case.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there have been rulings innumerable on this question. One was made by Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, when he was acting as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. The House had under consideration a bill relating to the classification of worsted goods as woolen. Under the tariff law woolen bore a higher rate of duty than worsted goods. Worsted goods were brought in at a lower rate of duty, and the intent of the tariff law was being evaded, making this difference in classification, making a difference upon the rate of duty on worsted goods. The object of the bill was to raise the duty upon worsted goods by classifying them as woolen.

Mr. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, offered an amendment providing:

That all wool, hair of the alpaca goat and other like animals, wool on the skin, woolen rags, mungo, waste, and slack shall be admitted when imported free of duty. That on and after the 1st day of October, 1890, in lieu of the duties imposed on the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on woolen and worsted cloths, and all manufactures of wool of every description made wholly or in part of wool, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. Nelson Dingley, jr., of Maine, made the point of order that the amendment related to a subject different from that with which the bill dealt.

The Chairman ruled as follows:

The latter part of clause 7 of Rule XVI provides:

"And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment."

The subject under consideration in this bill is the classification of worsted cloths as woolen cloths. That is the subject. The proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky is to put wool on the free list as an amendment. It seems to the Chair that that is a different subject. The Chair remembers in the last Congress, when a proposition was made on a bill for the admission of Dakota to amend it by adding the Territory of New Mexico, and the point was made that that was on a subject different from the one under consideration, the then Speaker of the House, Mr. Carlisle, decided that it was a different subject, although relating to the same general subject. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out of order.

On a vote by tellers, an appeal having been taken, this decision was sustained—74 ayes to 36 nays.

Mr. Chairman, this is only one of a long series of decisions of a similar kind. The object of the rule has always been observed by the House in this connection—that you can not, under color of amendment, introduce another subject or a different subject into the bill. We have had rulings where the claim of one man was presented and the motion was made to add the claim of another person, that that was not germane. We have had cases where the salaries of a certain class of officers—judges of court—were the subject of the bill, and it was held that you could not add the salary for marshals and other officers of the court. And so on in innumerable decisions.

This case decided by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] seems to have covered the point completely. I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that there is a decision on which some gentlemen place reliance, made in 1870. I want to call attention to the fact that every one of these other decisions, which I might quote by the hundred, were made since 1870, and these hold that they were not in contravention of the decision made in 1870 and that the rule plainly requires that the Chair and the House should hold that such an amendment was not germane.

On June 3, 1870, the House resumed the consideration of the bill of the House (H. R. 2045) to reduce the internal taxes, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the forty-fifth section of the same.

Mr. James Brooks, of New York, proposed to submit the following amendment:

Add to the section the following proviso:

"Provided further, That on and after the 1st day of January next the duties levied upon the articles hereafter named imported from foreign countries shall be reduced as follows:

"On sirup of cane juice, or melado, or molasses from sugar cane, and on all sugars, and on salt, 33½ per cent.

"On coffee and on tea, 20 per cent; and on pig and scrap iron, 22½ per cent.

"And all imported goods, wares, and merchandise here described which may be in the public stores or bonded warehouses on the day of the year this act shall take effect shall be subjected to no other duty upon the entry thereof for consumption than if the same were imported, respectively, after that date."

The bill in that case was being discussed in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Speaker [Mr. Blaine] stated that the House had given unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill in the House; that would cover all amendments considered germane, and hence the only question at issue is whether the amendment be germane. In his opinion the amendment was germane from the very necessities of the case, for it might be of the utmost importance in determining the internal revenues to be derived from any article, to determine also what the external revenues shall be from the same article. He would, however, submit the question to the whole House.

Which he did; and it was decided in the affirmative, or that the amendment was germane and was in order.

But there was before the House at that time a general internal-revenue bill, a bill applying to all articles, a bill relating to the taxation of various articles of internal revenue; and Mr. Blaine suggested that it might be of the utmost importance where certain articles were to be subjected to an internal-revenue tax to provide also for an external-revenue tax on the same articles—that is, for custom duties to be levied upon those articles—a long way from deciding that in a case like this, where we have simply a proposition for "reciprocal trade relations between the United States and the island of Cuba," we can go into a general amendment of the tariff (for that is what this proposition means) upon such a bill.

Mr. Chairman, if you hold this amendment in order you simply wipe out the last clause of paragraph 7 of Rule XVI of the House of Representatives. You simply repeal a rule of the House. You "wipe it away," in the choice language of the gentleman from Missouri, as empty cobwebs, as a "weak or trivial rule;" and the House enters upon the execution of its purpose to undertake to review and pass upon and amend the tariff upon a bill providing simply for reciprocal trade relations. When you have done that you have, in effect, decided that upon a proposition brought here relating to one State an amendment relating to another State is germane; upon a proposition providing for the payment of one claim, an amendment to provide for another claim is germane; and so the hundreds of decisions that have been made under this very section of the rule are overturned. You simply wipe out the rule, and you might as well abolish it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, finding myself unable to agree with the conclusions of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], I feel bound to give the committee the reasons which, in my mind, establish the proposition that the pending amendment is germane to this bill. I agree entirely with the gentleman's suggestion that the rules of this House are made to govern its proceedings. I agree that unless this amendment is germane the Chair should rule it out and that the members of the committee on either side should sustain that ruling. Unless I can satisfy the committee and give reasons that should satisfy the Chair that this amendment, within well-recognized parliamentary rules, is germane, it should not be sustained.

Now, one moment before I enter upon the discussion of that question, because when I reach it I shall confine myself entirely and closely to it. I notice that the gentleman from New York says that a decree has gone forth from the other side that the rules of this House should be ruthlessly stricken down. I have sat here during the session this afternoon; I have listened to the speech of the gentleman from Iowa; I have listened to the speeches of two other distinguished Republicans upon this floor; but there is another insinuation which has been made on this floor, and which appears in the public prints, which, I regret to say, has not been repelled as it ought to be repelled.

If the public prints correctly report the proceedings of the Democratic caucus, referred to by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, the charge has been made that there have been approaches from this side of the House to enter into an unholy, ungodly, and infamous alliance to sacrifice human rights, in order to do—what? To preserve the prestige of the leaders of the House or, less justifiably than that, the profits of an aggregation of capital engaged in refining sugar. I would like to see that insinuation repelled from this side of the House. Can it be that if it is received in silence it is assented to as correct? I trust not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman make the denial?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. So far as I am concerned, absolutely and flatly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Who has been charged with making any such "alliance?"

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] stated in the caucus that he had been approached.

Mr. GROSVENOR. By whom?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. He did not say by whom.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then, while the charge stands in that anonymous condition will the gentleman from Maine give it weight?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; I think it is incumbent upon this side that it should be repelled.

A MEMBER. Let him name his man.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I did not put any credence in it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Whom do you want to have repel it?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to hear the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE], for the Republican majority, repel it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say one word.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I deny that I have made any such charge in the Democratic caucus or elsewhere, or ever made any such charge. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, that was a good specimen of the usual assaults upon Republicans. [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, I have succeeded, then, in relieving the Republican majority of the infamous charge. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to join in any propaganda that may proceed from the other side to break down the rules of this House. I wish to state now, on the threshold of this discussion, that if this amendment is germane, and if it be so ruled by the Chair, and if the members of this committee, in whom is vested the power to make and interpret their rules, hold it to be germane and it becomes a part of this bill, that it does not open this bill to any other tariff amendment. I think that proposition is unanswerable. I do not believe that this bill is subject to general revenue amendments.

The Speaker of the House, in holding that this was a privileged measure, held that it was a bill affecting the revenue; but I think it is necessary to go further than to hold that it is a bill affecting the revenue, in order to demonstrate that this amendment is germane. It is a bill affecting the revenue, and this amendment also relates to and affects revenue, but it is a revenue measure confined geographically to Cuba, and this amendment operates universally and generally throughout the whole country, and with reference to every country from which sugar is imported. The bill is special in its application.

The amendment is general in its application, and for that reason, if we stop there, in my opinion, the amendment is not germane. Now, with reference to this particular amendment repealing the differential on sugar, I submit with great confidence that there is not to be found in the journals and records of this House or in the precedents compiled by Mr. Hinds a single instance that furnishes upon all fours a precedent for a ruling either way. It is true, as was well stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], there are many rulings construing this rule, which reads:

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be adopted under color of amendment.

But there is no ruling and there is no case that stands on all fours with the proposition now before the committee. I defy the production by any man of any precedent that stands upon all fours with the pending proposition.

That many rulings have been made construing this rule, holding that particular amendments as applied to particular bills were not germane, is no doubt true; but these rulings are of no value here, except as they may illustrate by practical application the operation of the general principle of germaneness. The collation of a heterogeneous, miscellaneous lot of citations and precedents undoubtedly indicates a commendable amount of physical exertion. The patchwork result does not necessarily involve the exercise of reason or throw any light upon a new situation. Because any of these amendments were held not germane the Chair is not justified in so holding in this case, unless it can be made to appear that there is a general and well-defined principle established by these rulings, the application of which excludes this amendment. In other words, the decision must proceed upon reason, not upon authority, for in the sense of controlling authority in point there is none.

The rule as we have seen prohibits an amendment "on a subject different from that under consideration." Clearly the amendment need not be identical with the subject under consideration. It is enough if it is "on" or relating to the same "subject." It must fairly relate to and be connected with the "subject." So long as it relates to and is connected with the same subject it is not "on a subject different from that under consideration." The Century defines germane as "nearly related; closely akin; closely connected; germane." The Standard as "(1) near akin, germane; (2) hence in close relationship, appropriate, relevant, pertinent."

The question here is whether the amendment is "nearly related, closely connected," and in "close relationship" with, "appropriate," or "closely akin" to the subject-matter of this bill. I think it can be made to appear that it is necessarily involved in the subject-matter of the bill from a legislative and economic standpoint.

The differential in the sugar tariff is peculiar to that item in the schedule. There is no other item in the whole tariff schedule like it. There is no item to which the term "differential" applies, except to the item of sugar. The sugar item is found in section 209, of the "Tariffs of 1894 and 1897." Perhaps I should go further and say here with reference to the general question of germaneness that this amendment applies to the same subject-matter as the bill, but that is not sufficient; it is coterminus with the bill, that is to say, this amendment comes into existence with this bill; it goes out of existence with the bill, but that is not enough.

That is not sufficient. It applies to the same subject. It lives and it dies with the bill, but that does not go far enough in my judgment. Now, I submit this: That this differential stands upon an entirely distinct and different footing as compared with every other tariff schedule. Legislatively and grammatically the differential, which simply means the difference between the tariff on unrefined sugar and the tariff upon refined sugar, are identical and the same. They are both found in the same section. I will read it, so that we will see exactly where it comes from:

Sugars not above No. 16 Dutch standard in color, tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete and concentrated molasses, testing by the polariscope not above 75°, ninety-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound, and for every additional degree shown by the polariscope test thirty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound additional, and fractions of a degree in proportion.

That is a tariff upon what is called raw or unrefined sugar, and, here I should stop to make this suggestion, that raw sugar is not mentioned as "raw" in this law. It is not what we ordinarily call a raw material, because cane and beet are the raw materials out of which sugar is made. Unrefined sugar is a manufactured product as well as is refined sugar. I have just read, now, the tariff upon unrefined sugar. Now comes the balance of the section, separated only by a semicolon:

and on sugar above No. 16, Dutch standard in color, and on all sugar which has gone through a process of refining, 1 cent and ninety-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound; molasses testing above 40° and not above 56°, 3 cents per gallon.

The balance of the section has no reference whatever to the proposition. So, that, to begin with, the two elements which constitute the differential are legislatively one. They are contained in the same section; they are grammatically one. They are connected together, the tariff upon the refined and the tariff upon the unrefined. But that is not sufficient; that is not enough to show that this amendment is germane. But so far—and I call attention to it only for that purpose—thus far in the argument we have an identity of subject, an identity of existence, an identity of legislative unity, and an identity of grammatical unity.

But I am obliged to go further even than that. And let me go a little further right here to show what I have suggested, that it is only in this section 209 that this peculiar differential proposition can be found in the whole range of tariff legislation. Section 210, for instance, imposes a tariff upon maple sugar without any reference to unrefined sugar. Section 211 imposes a tariff upon saccharine, without any reference whatever to unrefined sugar. Section 212 imposes a tariff upon sugar candy and all confectionery, without any reference whatever to unrefined sugar. Now, let me analyze these two parts of one proposition found in section 209, resulting in the differential.

The tariff on sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard in color, and on all which has gone through a process of refining, is $1.95 on a hundred pounds, or 1.95 cents on a pound. The tariff on unrefined sugar not above 75°, polariscope test, is 95 cents per hundred pounds, or 0.95 cent per pound. Then there is 0.035 of a cent for every additional degree up to 100°, polariscope test, or up to the pure sugar, and that would give us 0.857 in addition. Add that to the 0.95 and we have 1.825 cents as the tariff on pure sugar. The difference between the tariff on unrefined sugar and the tariff on refined sugar or above No. 16 Dutch standard in color, taking the pure as a test, is 0.125 of a cent, or 12½ cents per hundred pounds.

That is the differential. If you take 96°, polariscope test, then you get 1.685, the figures that we have heard throughout this debate ad libitum. That is the largest proportion that is imported into the country, and therefore that is taken into account largely in making the computation.

What is the purpose of the differential? What purpose does it serve, and what is the intention of the law? The purpose of the differential is to give to the refiner a tariff that protects him in the exercise of his business and his industry. It is more than the tariff on unrefined, because he is supposed to pay the tariff on the unrefined before he gets the material that he refines.

Now, mark another distinction between this differential tariff and this particular section of the tariff law, and that is this: That there is no change in the substance when there is a change in the tariff imposed, because sugar that tests 96° and sugar that tests 75 degrees polariscope is sugar, and sugar that is refined is still sugar. Sugar below No. 16, Dutch standard, in color is just as much sugar as is that which is above that standard in color. It is the same subject and the same material, unchanged in kind, character, structure, or identity; simply a change in quality.

Let me go a little further. What is the purpose of the differential? It is to give to the unrefined-sugar manufacturer and to the refined-sugar manufacturer each his fair and equal proportion of protection. I do not know whether the existing tariff is based upon scientific principles or not. I do not know whether the protection is too large for the refiner or too small for the refiner. I do not know whether the manufacturer of the refined gets more relative protection than does the manufacturer of the unrefined. For the purposes of this argument we can assume that it is based upon economic and scientific principles, and that the one is fairly proportioned to the other. If so, it produces in connection with this schedule a proposition which stands upon the unrefined-sugar tariff upon one hand and upon the refined-sugar tariff upon the other, and when that proposition is complete it produces a legislative equilibrium between the two tariffs.

Now I come to my proposition. Any legislation that tends to disturb the tariff equilibrium in connection with this sugar schedule, by disturbing the differential or otherwise, destroys the equilibrium and makes the consideration of the other branch of the proposition absolutely necessary in order to preserve and maintain the equilibrium. [Applause.] Unrefined sugar has one tariff, refined sugar another, to-day. If you shorten or diminish the unrefined-sugar tariff, you shorten one of the legs upon which the proposition stands; and if you increase it, you lengthen the leg upon which the proposition stands, and either process destroys alike the legislative equilibrium which ought to and economically must exist between the two tariffs.

If this bill in any of its phases disturbs or makes it possible to disturb either branch of this proposition, and thus destroys or makes it possible to destroy the legislative equilibrium that ought to exist, then of necessity this amendment is competent and germane—not only is closely connected with, relates to, but is necessarily involved in the subject-matter of the bill—because otherwise you would have legislation that would result in an absence of the equilibrium that we are bound to maintain between these two tariffs. It would be a violation of economic principles.

Let me illustrate. Suppose that all of the unrefined sugar that is imported into this country came from Cuba. Is it not clear that any disturbance of the tariff on unrefined sugar would destroy the existing equilibrium, which must economically and properly be maintained, would then render proper and necessary an amendment to the tariff on refined sugar in order to preserve that equilibrium? If all the unrefined sugar came from Cuba it would make no kind of difference whether it came under reciprocal trade arrangements with Cuba or otherwise.

The disturbance of that equilibrium would be precisely the same. When you reduce the tariff or repeal it altogether, in case the whole product came from Cuba, then you would have an absolute economic destruction of the equilibrium and enlarge enormously the margin within which the American sugar refiner can pile up his profits at the expense of the American people, because he could protect himself in refining and manufacturing against all outside competition. Therefore his protection would be maintained upon his leg of the proposition that maintains and secures the equilibrium. If you do that by reducing it by a reduction of 50 per cent, you would disturb it precisely by 50 per cent. A reduction of 20 per cent would not be so much, but the same in degree.

Well, now, we do not receive it all for Cuba. What then? We not only receive sugar from Cuba, but from all countries of the world. Last year, ending June 30, 1901, from all countries we received 3,975,500,840 pounds; from Cuba we received 25 per cent, or 1,099,400,303 pounds. But who is there that will say that a reduction on the amount of 25 per cent does not pro tanto, pro rata, disturb the existing equilibrium? If it does, then this amendment is necessarily germane. Why? The tariff upon refined should be cut down pro rata, so as to make the two tariffs, in view of that importation, stand upon a fairly equal ratable footing and preserve a continuing equilibrium.

I come to the proposition that is now made. It may be said, and it can properly be said, and I desire to be perfectly frank in this argument, that this question is absolute res integra so far as the construction of the rules of this House is concerned. It is a case of entirely new impression. It is important to the Chair, no matter whether this decision is arrived at under pressure or otherwise, it is important when he interprets the rules of this House that it be done in accordance with the fundamental principles of parliamentary law.

It may be said that the price to the refiner will not be reduced by this pending bill, and that is a question that has been discussed with great zeal, with great acrimony, and a great deal of ability on the floor of the House. I do not propose to enter into a discussion of that vexed question.

In my judgment, so far as the germaneness of this amendment is concerned, it is not necessary for me to establish the proposition legislatively by the terms of the bill that necessarily the price to the refiner will be reduced in order to demonstrate that this amendment is germane.

I have no doubt, so far as I am personally concerned, that the American sugar refiners are taking a very consuming interest in forwarding the propaganda behind this legislation. I have not the slightest doubt that in every legitimate, proper, and rightful way they are expending their money in the interest of this propaganda. I do not in the least intend to intimate, and I do not believe, that in any improper manner or in any unworthy way they are expending a single copper.

I have not the slightest doubt but what they are expending it in a legitimate way; and there are many legitimate ways. Literature may be printed, and published, and circulated, and plate material can be prepared for newspapers throughout the country, and speeches can be printed in newspapers at advertising rates at so much a line legitimately, rightfully, and properly. I do not think they would expend their money, if they did not expect to profit thereby, by a reduction of the price. I have no doubt their expectations will be realized, because the men engaged in sugar refining are wiser in their generation than the children of light. [Laughter.] But I do not have occasion to go into that affair.

Let me go back to my illustration of a general tariff bill reducing the tariff on unrefined sugar without undertaking to affect refined. Everybody can see that would disturb the equilibrium. But it would not of itself—that is, the terms of the bill would not—compel the reduction of price to the refiners. It would make it probable that the price would be reduced to the refiner. For instance, if the tariff upon raw sugar was reduced 5 per cent, the refiner might not get any benefit in the reduction of price, although the margin of profit would thereby be increased and widened.

If reduced 20 per cent he might not get any benefit of the reduction in price, but when you reduce it 40 or 75 per cent the probability would be so great that it would practically amount to an absolute demonstration that he would receive the benefit in a reduction of price. What does that result in? Simply this: That it is not necessary to demonstrate the germaneness of the proposition that a reduction in price of the American Sugar Refinery would be compelled by the terms of the bill, would be necessarily deducible therefrom. So we have this proposition, that if the pending measure has made it possible or probable that the price would be reduced to the sugar refiner it would disturb the equilibrium and make it necessary to revise the other leg upon which the proposition stands in order to preserve the equilibrium.

Now, coming to this proposition, who is there that will say that under this pending bill, standing as it does now, it is not possible and even probable for the price to be reduced to the refiner? True, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] say that they do not think it will be reduced. Other gentlemen say that the sugar refiner will get it all. Let me read a moment from the statement of the gentleman from New York bearing upon this proposition. I do this, Mr. Chairman, to demonstrate the germaneness of this proposition and to show that it ought to be ruled in by the Chair. Here is what the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] said:

> We are told that the sugar trust is going to get the advantage of all that we take off of sugar.

That is his cautious statement necessarily admitting that the sugar trust would get the benefit of some of it. If that be true, then this amendment is germane.

Concluding the discussion, the gentleman said:

> We did not put a reduction of 50 per cent on or 100 per cent, because we did not wish to injure anybody in the first place, and we knew when we made it only 20 per cent the planter would have a right to demand and receive the full benefit.

Is that equivalent to an assertion that it would give the planter the full benefit? That the bill secured to him the full benefit? Not by any means. It simply says it gives the planter a right to demand and receive it, but it did not give him the power to enforce that demand. So, on the other hand, the refiner has an equal right to demand and receive the benefit of this reduction. Which will be successful the bill does not undertake to determine. That the refiner has the advantage in such a contest is clear. If that possibility inheres in this bill, if by the action of economic laws, operating in connection with the action of any combination or interest affecting this business, that result is possible or probable, then, Mr. Chairman, I submit that this amendment is not only clearly and palpably germane, but absolutely necessary in order to preserve the equilibrium between these two tariffs that is thus found to be disturbed. With the bane we must provide the antidote. I submit this proposition, Mr. Chairman, upon these considerations.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. The gentleman knows that I am in sympathy with his general proposition respecting the merits of the bill itself. I wish to ask a question for information. Assuming that this bill does disturb the economic equilibrium or balance of the sugar tariff schedule, does the gentleman think that there is any legislative necessity for new legislation maintaining the old economic balance that existed in the previous bill? In other words, so far as the point of order is concerned and so far as the germaneness of any proposed amendment goes, is not this House absolutely empowered to destroy, if it so desires, the economic balance, as my friend terms it, by new legislation? Is it not rather a question of political expediency than of legislative necessity or propriety?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Undoubtedly we have that power; but that is not the question. That does not determine the germaneness of the proposition. Undoubtedly the committee has power to refuse to adopt the amendment. The only question pending here is whether these considerations make it necessary, in the language of Mr. Blaine, which was quoted with approval by my friend from New York—and I will read it—the only question is whether this amendment or whether this bill makes it necessary (quoting the language of Mr. Blaine) "that both these propositions be considered together, because the one might obviously affect and determine the other"—whether they are both appropriate to or pertinent to the same subject, whether one, on general principles, is directly and fairly involved in the other.

It is not a question as to whether the committee ought or ought not to adopt this amendment, but whether at this time the rule gives them the right to act upon the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman say that I quoted the statement of Mr. Blaine with approval?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman referred to his language with approval.

Mr. PAYNE. Did I not say that the contrary had been held by a number of other distinguished occupants of the chair?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not think that that decision is a precedent for this amendment—not by any means. I do not think it sustains it. The principle stated sustains it.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I did understand the gentleman from New York to refer with approval to the language used by Mr. Blaine. Of course if he did not do that——

Mr. PAYNE. I did not intend to do it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not wish to misrepresent the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman another question as to this "equilibrium."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. The case I cited here——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The worsteds case?

Mr. PAYNE. The worsteds case. That was a case where the "equilibrium" was disturbed by classing worsteds as woolens, because the tariff was higher on woolens than it was, under the interpretation of the court, on worsteds. Now, the classification of worsteds as woolens disturbed the gentleman's "equilibrium."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Not at all.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman was consistent, it would have disturbed his "equilibrium."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That depends upon the point of view. The "equilibrium" of "the gentleman from Maine" is not so easily disturbed.

Mr. PAYNE. We will not play upon words, because the gentleman is an adept at that. The classification to which I have referred disturbs the "equilibrium" in that schedule. Now, the amendment offered by Mr. Breckinridge was designed to restore the "equilibrium" of that schedule by proposing a different tariff on wool, mungo, and the like.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. Still, notwithstanding that, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, with the approval of the House, ruled that that amendment was not in order.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. The doctrine of "equilibrium" does not seem to have been invented at that time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The doctrine of "equilibrium" had no earthly relation to the case you cite.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think it had, nor with this either.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You say that is a differential tariff on wool. I never heard of that before.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman is playing on words?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No.

Mr. PAYNE. We have a tariff on iron ore, and we have a tariff on steel. The difference is the differential between the two. There is always a differential where there is a higher degree of manufacture made out of the raw material. So we had a tariff on wool, and we had a differential on woolen goods. In the tariff on wool a duty was levied at so much a pound. When we came to put the differential on woolen goods we had first what was the farmer's tariff—the wool tariff—which was so much a pound on the weight of the goods. That was supposed to be and was the equivalent, the scientifically adjusted equivalent, to the tariff on wool. In addition to that, we had a differential; we had a tariff on the manufactured goods, independent and distinct from the other.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Of course, if the gentleman uses the term "differential" to mean the distiction between the tariff on a manufactured article that is not the same in kind with the raw material, to be sure it can have that application. But if he can find a single item in the tariff schedule like the item of sugar—an item which, without any change in its character, without any change in its substance, but simply a change in its quality—that has two tariffs predicated thereon, then this argument falls to the ground. No one ever used the term differential in the sense in which it is applied to the sugar schedule in connection with any other article.

A MEMBER. How about cigars and tobacco?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That has no application here. I looked that schedule up before I made this argument. That schedule does not sustain the distinction of the gentleman from New York, nor does any other schedule. That there are raw materials upon which a tariff is imposed, and that there are manufactured goods in part composed of raw material upon which another tariff is imposed, is true. But in every such case there is an entire change of substance and structure, other and different raw materials and elements, all combined with the original raw materials, enter into the product, so that you have an entirely new product, the result of a combination of numerous elements, the relation of all of which to the manufactured product must be considered in reaching the amount of tariff protection required.

A proposition so complex as to make it practically impossible to determine the actual effect upon the ultimate result of a change in the tariff upon one of the raw materials, whereas, in the item of sugar alone there is no change in product, the substance, or character of the thing, only in quality when refined, and when measured by the color standard the element of refining is entirely eliminated. If above No. 16 Dutch standard in color one duty is paid; if the same sugar is below a lower duty is paid. In the case of sugar the two tariffs operate absolutely undisturbed by any foreign considerations or elements. Hence, their operation is certain, definite, and unvarying, and any disturbance of either necessarily produces precisely the same relative result in every case. In this respect there is no parallel item.

I challenge the production of the item. Of course, from the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in the manner in which he uses the words "differential" he is perfectly correct; there is no doubt about that. There is a distinction between the tariff on a manufactured article and the raw material; that is, it is larger on one than on the other.

Mr. PAYNE. What in the world is refined sugar except the manufactured article from the raw sugar or the raw material?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Raw sugar is a manufactured article.

Mr. PAYNE. Pig iron is a manufactured article.

Mr. LONG. And wool.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Wool a manufactured article? Not at all.

Mr. PAYNE. Pig iron.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, is a tariff on jackknives parallel to the tariff upon refined sugar, or the tariff on cutlery or the mainspring of a watch? That is where the gentleman's argument will lead him, to say there is a differential on jackknives or razors as compared with pig iron. I leave the proposition standing on that—by that single schedule—and if any man in this committee can say there is a fair analogy between those two propositions, then he will say that this amendment is not germane, and if he says there is not a fair analogy between those two propositions—jackknives, cutlery, razors, mainsprings, and pig iron and unrefined and refined sugar, above and below No. 16 Dutch standard—when the only change is a change in quality and not in substance or kind, with no disturbing elements at all, then the argument falls to the ground.

If he can see that analogy, then he votes against the amendment. If he can not see it—and I leave it upon that—he votes for it. Now, whether the reduction provided by amendment is too large or too small, whether it produces an equilibrium, from the standpoint of economics, I do not know. That is a matter of no consequence so far as this proposition I am arguing is concerned. This is a question of legal competency. The question of the reduction is for the House. With these suggestions, Mr. Chairman, I submit the question.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, the bill before us says nothing about sugar. The word is not in it. A gentleman proposes an amendment to the bill, however, regulating the tariff on sugars from any country. If that is in order, then an amendment to regulate the tariff on tobacco coming from any country would be in order, and so on every other article that might be imported into this country. Suppose a bill was before us to erect a monument and appropriating public lands for its construction. Would anyone hold that it would be germane to that bill to bring in a law changing the price of the public lands and for the sale and mode of disposing of them? The object would be to build a monument. The bill, however, would refer to the public lands. A bill can not be amended by something that is not in furtherance of the object of the bill. That is the whole question, it seems to me. How can this amendment possibly be germane? [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, after the very clear and lucid argument of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] upon the point of order, it seems to me that it is almost superfluous to undertake to add anything. The proposition is as he has stated it. The point of order is made that the amendment of Mr. MORRIS is not germane to the bill, and the rule is invoked which provides that "no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment." The gentleman from Maine has shown that the subject of the amendment is identical with the subject proposed in the bill. If this be true, it is not easy to improve upon the able argument he has made and make the matter more lucid and clear.

The question may be asked, Mr. Chairman, if we are to be controlled by precedents. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], arguing the point of order, referred to the decision made by Mr. Speaker Blaine, which the gentleman from Maine has also cited, and he also refers to one or two other decisions made by gentlemen who were temporarily occupying the chair as chairman of the Committee of the Whole. One of these was the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. BURROWS, when he was a member of this House. Mr. Chairman, it will not be controverted that precedents may be found on both sides of this question. That being true, the question is which precedent will you follow. Now, it seems to me that when you come to look to the precedent you must examine the ground upon which the decision in each case was made. Mr. Speaker Blaine made the decision that the gentleman from Maine has referred to, and stated the grounds of that decision, which I wish here to repeat, in part at least.

Mr. Blaine decided when a bill was pending here fixing the rates of internal taxes that it was in order to offer an amendment for external taxes. Is not that what is done in this case? If a bill providing for the levying of internal taxes can be amended by a bill providing for external or general customs tariff taxes, then this amendment must be germane and in order.

Mr. Blaine held that that was true. He held that such an amendment was germane. Why did he so decide? The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] quoted some of the language of Mr. Speaker Blaine, but you will pardon me, Mr. Chairman, if I read two or three sentences from that decision which he did not read. The bill pending then, as I have stated, was a bill which applied alone to internal taxes. The amendment proposed was one which related to external revenue or taxes. When Mr. Eldridge of Wisconsin made the point of order in that case, Mr. Blaine said that the point presented was one of considerable importance, and he asked the attention of the House to what was involved in it. And I desire to call attention to what is involved in this proposition.

Mr. Speaker Blaine said:

It is whether an amendment relating to taxes usually embraced under the head of the tariff is an amendment germane to an internal-revenue bill. The point is in a certain sense new, for since the revival of internal-revenue taxation, beginning with 1862, the internal-revenue laws have been considered separately from the tariff laws by Congress.

But—

He says—

in the early history of this Government, as gentlemen must be well aware, both species of taxes were considered together.

He says:

In the judgment of the Chair the amendment offered is germane, from the very necessities of the case, for it might be of the utmost importance in determining the internal revenue to be derived from any article, to determine also what the external revenue shall be from the same article. The judgment of the House might, at a very critical time, be needed on both propositions, because the one might obviously affect and determine the other. The Chair, therefore, would regard it as a matter of very great significance and importance if the House should decide that under its rules an internal-revenue tax and an external-revenue tax could not be considered together. The point, however, is one which involves so many grave considerations that the Chair would be very far from desiring to force his judgment on the House.

Then he said, in order that the House might pass upon it, he would submit the question to the body. A little lower down he said:

The Chair had for the moment overlooked another case to which his attention was called by Mr. Schenck.

Mr. Schenck said:

With the permission of the Chair, I would direct attention to the fact that the same objection was made to a provision for amending the tariff on cigars, included in the internal-revenue law of last Congress, and with that provision was ruled to be pertinent to the bill.

Speaker Blaine said that he had overlooked that, and that he was glad to find an additional precedent confirming him in his opinion. He said he would say, further, that he had before him at this moment one of the most important revenue bills ever passed in this country, a bill passed by the First Congress in regard both to the tariff and domestic revenue on distilled spirits, both being considered together in the same bill.

The Chair therefore would say, while repeating that he does not desire to force his opinion on the House, that in his judgment it is entirely germane to amend an internal-revenue bill with an external-revenue bill, and that the two subjects are so connected that it would be a great inconvenience if it should become a settled parliamentary principle that they could not be considered together.

A little lower down he said:

This is a tax bill, and whether the amendment relates to an internal or external tax it is clearly, in the judgment of the Chair, within the power of the House to consider it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Speaker of this House, the day we entered upon consideration of the pending bill, held that it was a revenue bill or a bill affecting the revenue. Mr. Blaine said that an external-revenue amendment was germane to a bill providing an internal-revenue tax. Mr. Chairman, for illustration let us suppose that this bill, being a revenue bill, took out of the Treasury $200,000,000 instead of $8,000,000, as is argued and as is conceded. When you come to pass a bill which, let us suppose, in order to obtain the trade of Cuba, would take out of our Treasury $200,000,000 per annum, would it not be monstrous to say that this House could not, as an amendment to the bill, provide in some other way a tax or a tariff that would fill the vacuum in the Treasury made by this $200,000,000 of lost or surrendered revenue? The fact that this is only $8,000,000 does not change the principle. It might be $200,000,000, and if so, it seems to me that it would be unfortunate if the House were to put itself in the position that it could not provide in the same bill, by a germane amendment, that it would make up the $200,000,000 by levying taxes that were in their nature either internal or external.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York referred to a case which was decided by Mr. BLACKBURN while acting as Speaker pro tempore in this House. In that case, if I remember it correctly, a bill was pending having reference to an entirely internal matter—a tax on "weiss beer"—and to that pending bill a motion was made to fix the tax on salt. One a matter of internal tax and the other a matter of tariff tax. The Chair (Mr. BLACKBURN presiding temporarily when the point of order was made) held that the amendment was in order, or was before the House for consideration, and I think permitted a vote to be taken on it.

But that is not all, Mr. Chairman. During this very session of Congress I have a case in point. We had a bill pending here a few months ago providing a tariff for the Philippine Islands. I ask the attention of the Chair to the ruling of the Speaker of this House on that occasion. The Philippine tariff bill was pending. It was a bill which related alone to the Philippine Islands. The gentleman from New York bases a part of his argument upon the idea that this bill relates to Cuba. The bill to which I refer was a bill relating to the Philippine tariff. Now, while that bill was pending I had the honor to submit the following motion:

I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions which I send to the desk.

Of course, all gentlemen will understand that a motion to recommit stands exactly as a motion to amend, and is governed by the same rule and the same principles in parliamentary law. The motion to recommit must be upon a matter germane to the pending bill, as an amendment must be. The motion I had the honor to make on the 18th day of December to the Philippine bill is in the following words:

To report a bill reducing the tariff laws and internal-revenue laws now in force in other portions of the United States to a revenue basis and apply the same to all portions of the United States, including the Philippine Islands, to be in effect in said islands until order has been restored there and the Filipinos permitted, with the aid of the United States, to establish a stable and independent government.

The able gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, had charge of that bill providing for this Philippine tariff. When the motion was made, the permanent Speaker of the House was in the chair. My motion applied the bill to all portions of the United States, and not only to internal but to external taxes. The gentleman did not even make a point of order. I suppose he conceded that it was in order.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Did I not move the previous question on your motion then?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. You did, immediately.

Mr. PAYNE. Was it not the very easiest way to get rid of any other motion to recommit? And being so easy a proposition I took advantage of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Did not your demand for the previous question admit——

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman knows it does not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Do you not think that the demand for the previous question admitted that my motion was in order?

Mr. PAYNE. Why, certainly not; and the gentleman knows that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I said the proposition to amend the bill then pending, which applied alone to the Philippine Islands, so as to affect and alter all the tariff laws of the United States everywhere, was in order. The amendment I offered had to be germane. The Speaker of this House was in the chair, with all the members present, and the gentleman from New York was in charge of the measure. He made no point of order, but demanded the previous question on the motion. The Chair submitted it to the House of Representatives.

Mr. PAYNE. Does not the gentleman think he is pushed rather hard for an argument when he has to resort to a case where no point of order was made.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I presume the gentleman would have made a point of order, if he thought it was not in order, as he never overlooks his hand. [Laughter.] Now, then, Mr. Chairman, I am content to submit this question. I do not care if you can find where a Chairman of a committee, a gentleman called from the floor to preside either in the House or the committee for a few moments—temporarily called to preside in Committee of the Whole—may have made rulings different from that we now contend for. I confess that you may find some that are inconsistent with the position we take. I am sure you can not find any well-considered decision that overrules that of Mr. Speaker Blaine.

Now, as I said this morning, many of us differed in opinion with Mr. Blaine while in public life, as a politician; but, as I said, measuring my words, I do not believe that any man of any political party ever presided in that chair who was a better parliamentarian than Mr. Blaine. It is conceded the world over he was the parliamentarian of parliamentarians, and it seems to me merely to quote his decision ought to be conclusive of this case. I am content, Mr. Chairman, having cited that case, having read most of it to the Chair, to leave the matter in the hands of the Chairman of this committee. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] [Cries of "Rule."]

Mr. GROSVENOR and Mr. OLMSTED addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I will not detract by any word of mine from the high character given to Mr. Blaine by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], but I doubt not the members of the House of Representatives of this country will remember that upon the greatest question that we ever had of parliamentary construction, and the application of the greatest question of parliamentary right of the members and the organization of this House, Mr. Blaine was overruled by Speaker Reed, and that the decision of Mr. Reed as against that of Mr. Blaine has passed into parliamentary history of the United States without question, having been adopted by both parties in this House and having overruled the proposition of Mr. Blaine that you might take a horse to water but you could not make him drink. The courts of the country have all overruled Mr. Blaine on that question, beginning in Ohio and ending in New York.

We are moving a little forward, and the parliamentary decisions here for the last thirty years have overruled the suggestion of Mr. Blaine time out of mind, unless the argument of the gentleman from Maine is to be applicable. That argument has been made after careful study, and it comes to this in the last analysis. I ought to say that the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] leaves the argument of the gentleman from Maine without any footing whatever. It has not the slightest application, for the simple reason, as I will show in a moment, that the gentleman from Maine is supposing a condition of things in the future that he has no warrant for supposing whatever. His argument is this: That notwithstanding the plain terms of the rule of the House of Representatives that where the legislative view of duty on the part of the legislative department of the Government suggests to the legislature that if change A is made, then change B ought to be made; in that case they are germane and belong to the same family. That is the whole of it.

His proposition is that the Chairman of this committee shall take this bill and under his suggestion shall decide that the passage of this bill would disturb the equilibrium of refined sugar. Why? Because it will cut down, or probably might cut down, or possibly it might cut down, the receipts of the Treasury Department from the importation of sugar into this country, and that would disturb the equilibrium. What equilibrium? I take it it would disturb the equilibrium of the Treasury receipts on the article sugar, and that that equilibrium having been disturbed, where does the equilibrium distribute itself as to any legislative intent?

The equilibrium extends to the Treasury Department. Would not an income tax be a good thing to compensate for cutting down of the taxes upon sugar and thus disturbing the equilibrium?

But the gentleman will say that that is an unfair argument, and that the disturbance of the equilibrium to which he has referred is the equilibrium of equal taxation upon the item of sugar; that is to say, that the Chairman of this committee shall transform himself into an expert and decide that because we have concluded that we will cut down the tariff on raw sugar coming from a single location 30 per cent, that therefore there is too much compensation or differential upon the refined sugar. Who is to say that? Why, non constat, the legislative power here has decided that there is too much protection on raw sugar, and therefore the legislative department of the Government has concluded that we will take off 20 per cent.

Now, what right has the Chairman of this committee to say that that disturbs the legislative equilibrium or that there is an equilibrium disturbed that the Legislature ought to attend to and regulate? Why, that might be the very way to go into the subject of reciprocity and turn over the whole of the Cuban production for the mere purpose of bringing about the very equilibrium he is talking about. It might be, and it is, just as fair and a great deal fairer to suppose that the legislative branch of the Government, if it reduces the tariff on sugar coming from Cuba 20 per cent, to say that it has done so for the purpose of reestablishing the equilibrium that has not been maintained by the Legislature up to this time.

The whole argument turns upon this. What right has the gentleman from Maine to assume that through the action of this committee it can be assumed that the Legislature here intends now to do all the legislation in this single act that it has the power to do hereafter. That seems to me to be the whole of the argument.

Now, coming to the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], there is that proposition which stands denied by the gentleman from New York as being claimed by the gentleman from Maine to be on all fours. Then come to the second line of policy of this House running through thirty years of administration that says this is absolutely incompetent as an amendment to this bill. Mr. Chairman, I only have a word or two to say. The dignity of the House of Representatives will stand in the estimation of the public just so far and no farther as the House stands by its rules and upholds the dignity of its own organization. And whenever you undertake to say that because you would like to do a thing in a certain way which the rules of the House forbid, you will do it, you have entered upon a pathway that leads to confusion, chaos, and, substantially, legislative revolution.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, only a moment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW], the venerable ex-Speaker of this House, has, I think, put this whole matter in a nutshell. If this differential on sugar opens up the tariff question, opens the question as to sugar, then the differential between manufactured cigars and leaf or filler tobacco is in the same position, and opens up the whole question as to tobacco. Now, I have seen only one strong argument in favor of overruling the point of order. I send to the Clerk's desk the resolution adopted last night by the Democratic caucus. That binds the Democratic side of the House on my left; I trust that it will not be followed by many gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. Chairman, there is only one way to revise the tariff, and that is to revise the tariff; and the proposition made by the gentleman from Minnesota is simply the first step in general tariff revision. It has no parliamentary connection with the proposition now before the Committee of the Whole to give reciprocity to Cuba.

I ask the Clerk to read in my time the resolution of the Democratic caucus, which binds the judgment of the members of that party.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That we favor the removal of the differential duty on refined sugar, both from Cuba and elsewhere, and believe that such amendments are properly in order, and we insist that it is the duty of all Democrats to vote whenever opportunity is given to have these amendments added to the pending bill providing for Cuban reciprocity. We are opposed to the adoption of the previous question when the bill is reported to the House unless it shall have been properly amended in Committee of the Whole, as this will prevent an opportunity for just and proper amendments, with recorded votes on the same.

Resolved, That the action of this caucus is binding.

[Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. That resolution may be "binding," but it is "binding" on the other side; not upon us.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who made the point of order [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], instead of addressing the Chair, as though expecting the Chair to make a decision upon it, addressed the community—their neighborhood. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] addressing themselves to the point of order, addressed also the Chair. So far as the Chair is advised in regard to the arguments all of them are upon the one side, the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Tennessee having addressed their arguments to the Chair against this point of order, and the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Ohio having addressed their appeals in support of it to their fellow-members.

This is a peculiar course of proceeding adopted by the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Ohio. The result naturally would be, I should think, that the Chairman would reach the conclusion that those who addressed him and who thought they had something to say which might influence his judgment and might guide him to a correct ruling should have more influence with him than those who ignored him, turned their backs upon him, and addressed the by-standers. [Laughter and applause.]

In this state of the case it seems to me it would be entirely just and proper—it would be treating the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Ohio with very much deference and consideration, if the Chair should refer this point of order to the House itself—if he should simply say, "Gentlemen, I submit this question to the audience that you have addressed; you have not submitted the matter to me; I pass it over to you."

This really is a question not so much as to what somebody has ruled, or what some rule is, or what somebody may rule, as whether this body will or will not vote to take the differential duty off sugar—will vote in the interest of the people by doing that, or will vote in the interest of the sugar trust by refusing to do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The question, therefore, being so directly, so pointedly addressed to the judgment and the conscience—and as to some members, to their allegiance to the sugar trust; as to others, to their allegiance to the American citizen—it seems to me peculiarly appropriate that the Chairman should submit it to the House.

I take it the Chairman has not made up his mind conclusively upon the subject. [Laughter.] The discussion has proceeded for some time. While the Chairman might have deliberated upon the question when the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Ohio were addressing the populace—while the Chairman might have been informed upon it while listening to the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Tennessee—I take it that, inasmuch as the Chairman has dropped no intimation of the kind, he has not made up his mind upon this very important question. Therefore, it seems to me, it would be economy of time, it would lead to a correct and speedy disposition of this question upon the merits, for the Chair to simply submit it to the House itself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when questions of the Constitution have arisen heretofore I have heard gentlemen say that we have progressed, that we are traveling and growing and enlarging, that we have become a "world power," and that the shackles of the Constitution and the old interpretations of the Constitution ought not to bind or control us. Yet, so strange are the transformations that take place, gentlemen like the gentleman from New York and like the eloquent gentleman from Ohio are now advocating a policy which, if it prevail, will protect the sugar trust and leave the American people unprotected; and they hang their argument entirely upon a criticism of somebody's ruling or the letter of somebody's rule.

Of course my views upon this subject are well understood by those who care to understand anything about them. I have thought and still think that all rules which deserve respect and all rulings which deserve to be followed have for their principal object—I might say, have for their sole object and being—the expediting of business in the House, so that there may be a fair and full consideration of matters, and, according to the judgment of those who decide them, a decision upon the merits. For rules which hamper and restrict, for rulings which tie up, giving gentlemen an opportunity to hide and shelter themselves in pretense and hyprocrisy behind rule or rulings, I have not any particular respect and do not profess any.

I do not think that, in deference to the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Ohio, who certainly want this question referred to the audience which they addressed, the Chairman would expedite business and simplify matters very much by submitting this whole question to the Representatives present, as his great predecessor in the chair, Mr. Blaine, did upon a memorable occasion, to which attention has been drawn. Here we are now in pretty large number; here we are upon one side or the other of this sugar-trust question; let the Chairman just submit the point of order and say, "Gentlemen, do what you please about it; vote for the sugar trust or against it."

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. Does he not feel that he is hardly a fair judge, after deciding the question last night in caucus?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Oh, I feel that I am a fair judge, and I feel that the House will be so fair a judge that I am now modestly recommending to the Chairman to just put the whole thing upon the House, and submit the whole question to the judgment of the House. I think it is the best thing to do. I think it is the fairest thing to do. I am willing to take the chances upon the decision of the House. We will at least find out, whatever the decision be, who stands for the sugar trust and who stands for the American people, and the whole cobweb rule will be swept aside. [Applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, a distinguished gentleman of New York once said: "What is the Constitution among friends?" And the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], if I correctly understand the remarks made by him yesterday and those he has just concluded, says in effect: "What are the rules among friends?"

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. DE ARMOND. He misunderstands me—what is a little rule upon an issue between the sugar trust and the American people? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, that is about as near the point as anything we have heard upon this question from that side. It has at least the merit of candor in practically conceding that the rule does forbid the amendment. Now, this little rule has been commented and passed upon by even more distinguished Democrats than the gentleman from Missouri—by such Democrats as Speaker Howell Cobb, Speaker John G. Carlisle, and Speaker Crisp—all of whom considered it to be among the most important rules which this House has ever enacted for its government. I propose to refer to a few decisions which have not yet been mentioned. They are not decisions, as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], made by members who may be called from time to time from the floor to occupy the chair for a few minutes or a few hours, but decisions by distinguished parliamentarians whom even he will respect.

I wish to say at the outset, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Speaker Blaine never made such a ruling as has been attributed to him. He declined to make the ruling. He did say enough to indicate that he would like to have a certain amendment considered, but he would not take the responsibility of saying that it was germane under the rules. He would not risk his reputation as a parliamentarian by so ruling, and therefore he submitted it to the House, and the House being in favor of the amendment voted that it should be considered. So much for the alleged ruling of Speaker Blaine.

Now, I call attention to the ruling of a distinguished Democrat in a case which seems to me to be parallel. There was pending in the House an act for the relief of the widow of the late Major-General Worth. This was on the 12th of April, 1850, in the first session of the Thirty-first Congress. (See page 714 of the Congressional Globe.) An amendment was offered making a general provision relative to all widows of officers. Mr. Kaufman made the point that the amendment was not germane, "because the bill was a special bill for the relief of a particular individual, while the amendment was a general proposition." I will not stop to read the discussion, but simply the ruling of Mr. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, the Speaker of this House at that time. He said:
